ORGANISTS AND ORGAN STUDENTS.

AINSWORTH'S PATENT ACTIONS & ORGAN PEDALS

May be easily attached to any Piano, Harmonium, or Organ, and they afford perfectly unique Pedal Practice. Having put down at my Works two Engines and Machinery of the most desirable kind, and I am now supplying my goods to the Trade and Profession at actually lower prices than that charged for the Old Roller Action and its modifications. You are kindly requested to have one of AINSWORTH'S Illustrated Lists by you. On receipt of trade or professional card you will receive Lists and liberal terms. All AINSWORTH'S Actions from Class C upwards are fitted with Modifying Stop, whereby the whole compass of pedal notes are modified (pp, p, f, ff) at will, although the performer pedal exactly the same.

MY DEAR SIR,—I have much pleasure in informing you that your Pedals have given the fullest satisfaction. I have them combined with my practice Piano. Many of my musical friends who have seen them, as well as my organ pupils, are quite delighted with them; and I must acknowledge that I have never met with any Pedals so noiseless and pleasant to play upon as yours. The Action I consider durable, and of very good workmanship. Every organist who desires to perfect his playing will welcome your invention. I can recommend your goods in every respect.

To JOHN AINSWORTH, Esq.

Yours truly,

HERR J. RODENKIRCHEN,

Organist, The Cathedral, Cologne, Germany.

Postal Address: J. AINSWORTH, F.S.Sc., Mendelssohn House, Brinscall, Chorley (Eng.)

N.B.—AINSWORTH'S Works are two minutes' walk from Brinscall Station. Inspection allowed to intending Customers.

A few applications for my Lists were accidentally destroyed. Applicants not having received are kindly requested to send their address.—J. A.

JOHANNES BRAHMS.*

It is always difficult to write a man's biography in his lifetime. In the first place, his career has not ended, and who can tell how the doings of later years may affect the permanent estimate of his character and worth? In the next place, it is almost impossible to form a correct judgment while the person to be judged is so near, so much mixed up with current affairs, and so intimately concerned in the investigations which must needs be a preliminary process. Strictly speaking, the biographer should deal with the dead, and the dead of ten years ago rather than ten days. Then only can he take the calm and comprehensive view, and act with the unshrinking honesty which are the essentials of his craft. The difficulty to which we have referred is found in a special degree where the subject to be treated has lived an inner rather than an outer life. A moment's consideration will prove to the reader that there is a vast difference among men in this respect. Some are men of thought, others of action; some discharge their mission before the eyes of the world, others do the same in solitude; some mark their course through life by the exercise of personal attributes, others are known only through their works. It is the invisible, almost impersonal, men of thought that give the biographer trouble. They furnish him with no story; and, their task unfinished, their career still incomplete, there is not sufficient data for the discharge of his highest functions. Yet it is needful sometimes—or, at all events, desirable—not to wait for death before satisfying public curiosity concerning eminent men, and the desirableness exists in exact proportion to the measure in which the subject of biography lives apart from the public gaze. Take, for example, the case of Johannes Brahms, regarding whom English amateurs have long felt more or less desire for better acquaintance without being able to gratify it. Apart from short sketches in dictionaries of music, no Brahms literature has existed till very lately; and only within the last few days has the book appeared which is the first to deal with its interesting subject so as to be of use to English readers.

Mr. Fuller-Maitland's preface to the work under review is brief and to the point. It emphasises in a few sentences the difficulties of contemporary biography in a case like that of Brahms:—

"The biographical part of the work is of necessity short, for not one of the giants of music has had so uneventful a career as has fallen to the lot of Brahms, if we except Sebastian Bach, with whom, in this and many other respects, our master may be fitly compared. Since there is no prospect of our seeing the greatest composer of our time in England, we might well have expected a little more information as to his actual outward appearance and manner; but we must thankfully accept what we can get, and not grumble because the author has chosen to emphasise the important features of his compositions, rather than to dwell upon the colour of his hair or the cut of his clothes."

The editor of course sees that the absence of personal details is a result of writing contemporary biography. Particulars of this kind, whether they deal with beauties or defects, are grossly out of place, and would legitimately give cause of offence. Not every man likes the whole world to be told that his hair is red, or his nose a snub, that he takes a spirituous nightcap and only bathes once a month; and that either he dresses like a dandy or a scarecrow. Cromwell commanded his portrait painter to be sure and put the warts on his rugged face, but the Lord Protector had ways of his own which were not those of other men, and in this respect, as in many more, forms an exception to the rule. It was to be expected that Dr. Deiters would withhold information about the appearance, dress, and manners of his friend—information for which we must properly wait till such details become historical. Mr. Fuller-Maitland takes up another part of his Preface with deprecation of comparison between Brahms and Wagner. He might have spared himself the trouble, because no sensible man ever thinks of placing the two composers vis-à-vis for such a purpose. Brahms is a classical musician according to the order of the great masters; Wagner was a specialist who invented a "new art" and kept himself strictly to it. We might as well compare Mr. Whistler with Constable or Gainsborough, or Walt Whitman with William Cowper as pit Wagner against Brahms. However, it seems that no books, or even prefaces to books, can be written now without dragging in the name of the Bayreuth master. He is the King Charles's head of innumerable Mr. Dicks.

Dr. Deiters could not, of course, write a life of Brahms without throwing his hero's personality into some sort of relief, and in reading we do really get to know a little about the man himself, though we see rather him in his relation to music than anything else. Here is a passage which will be read with interest:—

"It was in the middle of the fifties—if we are not mistaken, in the summer of 1856—that we first met, in Bonn, a young musician whose whole demeanour at once distinguished him from the rest of his youthful companions. Not that he was remarkable for the external freedom of manner common among artists, which, however, seldom arouses our sympathy. He seemed, on the contrary, unconcerned by (with or about) the world around him, filled with an artistic ideal, absorbed in striving after some conscious aim, yet ready to share freely and amiably with others the treasures of his artistic convictions. A common interest had guided us both to the spot where the great master so heartily honoured by all the young school—Robert Schumann—was then living, overshadowed by his heavy affliction. The young artist was eager to see the master whom he, too, so highly revered. If his natural enthusiastic manner pleased at first sight, much more did one learn to like him on hearing him speak with sincere veneration of the great master's ideas and of their relations towards each other. This young artist was Johannes Brahms. Although at that time he was little known to the general public, those who were truly interested in the history of music had shortly before had their attention drawn to him by the glowing prophetic words with which Schumann himself had introduced him into the ranks of creative artists. These words, gladly acquiesced in by some, called forth criticism and contradiction from others—even from earnest men of artistic culture—who could not at once reconcile themselves to the peculiar style of Brahms's compositions."

* "Johannes Brahms: a Biographical Sketch." By Dr. Hermann Deiters. Translated, with Additions, by Rosa Newmarch. Edited, with a Preface, by J. A. Fuller-Maitland. London: T. Fisher Unwin. 1887.

With the foregoing passage Dr. Deiters opens his book, and it is all with which he favours us as the result of personal intercourse with Brahms. As for the incidents and circumstances of the composer's career, it is astonishing into what a small space Dr. Deiters manages to compress them. The biographer, however, is to be pitied. He had to make bricks without straw—to write a life which, apart from composition, is depressingly uneventful. Take this fact from the following summary, which comprises every incident mentioned by our author:—

Born at Hamburg, May 7, 1833. Belongs to a musical family. Early displayed talent as pianist under Cossel, and made progress in theoretical studies under Marxsen. Appeared in public at the age of fourteen, playing his own Variations on a Volkslied. Accompanied Remenyi on a concert tour (1853) and attracted the attention of Joachim and Liszt—of the first-named by transposing from A to B flat, and from memory, the Kreutzer Sonata. Same year, visited Schumann at Düsseldorf with a letter from Joachim, and played at Leipzig, where Breitkopf and Härtel began the publication of his works. Visited Liszt at Weimar (1854), and became musicmaster to the Prince of Lippe Detmold. Refused a professorship at the Cologne Conservatorium. A few years later went to live in Hamburg, afterwards in Switzerland, and subsequently (1862) in Vienna, where he fixed his abode. Became director (1863) of the Singakademie, but resigned in 1864. Travelled much in Germany and Switzerland (1864-6). Produced his "German Requiem" (1867). Resided at Bonn in summer of 1868, and at Baden-Baden in that of 1869. Directed at Vienna, the concerts of the "Society of the Friends of Music" (1872-5), meantime frequently appearing in various German towns. Conducted (1880) the performance in memory of Robert Schumann at Bonn.

Had ever biographer to deal with a career more destitute of incident and subjects for picturesque description? The whole thing is—we are not now referring to any matter of inner life or artistic achievement—barren in the extreme. Nothing could be more quiet, plodding, uneventful. It is curious that, save for a short residence in Switzerland, and a few visits there, Brahms has never been out of the empires of Austria and Germany, in each of which he has made his home. Bearing in mind the restless wanderings characteristic of our age, this fact is suggestive. The cases of Bach and Beethoven, who remained for life within the same limits, are hardly on all fours with that of Brahms. In their day travelling was a formidable matter, both as regards purse and person; whereas now it is not only safe, easy, and cheap, but almost an obligation upon men of culture and standing. The obstinately stay-at-home spirit of Brahms—he would not come to England even for the honours of an ancient university—must, therefore, be evidence either that he lacks curiosity, and is indifferent to any country but his own, or that his real life, the object of all his sympathies and energies, is that which passes within. In any case, we have here a remarkable indication of character, such as, taken in connection with what is outwardly a common-place existence, cannot be overlooked in any judgment of the man.

Having sketched the career of his hero, Dr. Deiters sums up his present position in an interesting passage:

"Thus giving himself up without hindrance to the joy and freedom of composing, sustained by the enthusiastic admiration, not merely of his close friends and followers, but by that of the general public, received with warmth wherever the production of his works may lead him, Brahms has now reached that sure pinnacle of success which all true artists may well envy. His works, which now exceed one hundred, besides several compositions without opus number, include, as the foregoing biographical sketch shows, every sort of composition with the exception of dramatic works. In number the chamber music and songs preponderate, while in substance and importance, the greater choral and orchestral works hold the most important position. It is these latter works which have of late attracted the eyes of the whole musical world towards our artist, and awakened a desire to assign him his place in the development of music. It is now no longer possible to pass over his works as strange and unintelligible, on the contrary, all true lovers of art must feel constrained to range themselves on his side."

Some of our readers may be of opinion that the sentence last quoted goes a little too far, but the author is writing of his hero, and the whole of his opinions upon the works and genius of Brahms must be taken with the reservations which a case of hero worship demands. We may, perhaps, light upon instances in which this is peculiarly needful.

Dr. Deiters distinctly claims Brahms as a national musician. He remarks: "Highly as Brahms honoured Schumann, and well as he knows how to employ the means of expression with which the latter enriched the art of music, he cannot, in our opinion, be classed as a follower of this master. It is to that fountain-head of all melody—national music—that he owes more than to any other example; it has yielded him all that is natural and original, and the truthfulness of his expression is ever being purified in this living stream. The decisive rhythm of his melodies, and his skill in alternating and combining a diversity of rhythmic forms, are parts of his originality. He has the art of adapting music to unusual and antique metres in a surprisingly clever way, of which we have already given several examples." The national character here claimed for Brahms is, of course, better judged by Germans than by Englishmen, but there can hardly exist a doubt, even in the most alien mind, that our author has expressed no more than the truth. Brahms's music, quite apart from considerations of its higher structure and expression, is intensely German, and as national au fond as that of his Bohemian contemporary, Dvorák. In this, perhaps, lies one of the secrets of his strength with his own countrymen, who find themselves instinctively—many of them without knowing why—in sympathy with his music. But we cannot go entirely with Dr. Deiters when he speaks thus:—"We must add that while we always find in Brahms's inventive power something peculiar to himself, the ruling principle with him is, after all, a regard for pure musical form, and that never once, from the first moment of conscious power, has he exalted expression at the expense of beauty. In this respect, and especially in clearness, abundance, and beauty of melody, he closely follows Beethoven." Our author's assertion in respect of Brahms's "regard for pure musical form" must receive hearty assent, and it is one of the glories of the German master that, at a time when men who ought to know better are trying to destroy form without being able to put anything in its place, he stands fast by the good old way—the way of masters who were giants, the way worn by the feet of generations. On the other hand, we are unable to concede that Brahms has never "exalted expression at the expense of beauty," and it is possible, on this point, to quote Dr. Deiters against himself. Referring to a movement of the Pianoforte Sonata in C, the biographer remarks:—"Passing on to the working out of the parts, we ask ourselves at times if the combinations are not too daring, if the harsh harmonies and modulations do not overstep the line of beauty, if the roundness of form is not disturbed by thematic accessories, and science made the first object, to the detriment of a natural fundamental development. We gather a similar impression from the other sonatas, &c." Precisely. Dr. Deiters has answered Dr. Deiters in the neatest manner, and put into few words the objections largely raised against a good deal of Brahms's music, especially the earlier works. That his later compositions are clearer, more moderate, and more beautiful is no doubt due to the fact that Brahms, as his biographer puts it, passed a time "of hard work, of conscientious self-criticism, of unremitting study of the greatest models; henceforth we find him striving after moderation, endeavouring to place himself more in touch with the public, and to conquer all subjectiveness. To arrive at perspicuity and precision of invention, clear design and form, careful elaboration, and accurate balancing of effect, now became with him essential and established principles." The first result of this, according to Dr. Deiters, appears in the D major Serenade (Op. 11), which certainly shows a change sufficiently for the better to warrant the assertion, though it must be said that not a few later compositions, including portions of the latest symphony, indicate a temporary relapse into the intense subjectivity which causes the composer to strive after the expression of ideas and feelings with little regard for absolute beauty.

We must further agree with our author when he says:—"In Brahms we see before us an artist of the most serious nature, filled with the strongest sense of the dignity of his art. Since Beethoven, we hardly find anyone so totally free from all that we may call trite and commonplace in music as Brahms, and no artist possesses in so great a degree the virtue of self-restraint, or is so averse to all that fascinates by merely external or transient attractions. Those who expect, in a work of art, anything beyond art itself, must look elsewhere. They will never understand Brahms. This artistic severity shows itself, not only in all that has been said about the treatment of technique, but also in the constant struggle after truth, and a profoundly human expression, and, though it is not easy to establish any rule here, we may call it the characteristic and tenour of his nature that great and serious feelings have the strongest attraction for him, and that he is wonderfully successful in expressing them. Hence his predilection for religious subjects, and hence, also, the profound impressiveness of the 'Requiem,' and similar works. But everything he touches is ennobled by the truthfulness with which he grasps and renders the deepest feelings of the soul, by the rejection of all that is trivial and of merely subjective value, and by the pursuit of all that is simple and grand in humanity. Filled as he is with these deep feelings, he expresses them in the language of music, and thus obtains that naïveté and warmth of tone which so profoundly touches every student of Brahms's work." This is well stated and, on the whole, profoundly true. To the musicians of a later time Brahms will appear as a strong and solid figure in an age of self-seeking and vacillation. The great temptation of the present time is to strive after personal success, and, in doing so, to make any sacrifice of conscientiousness and conviction. Men feel that they must keep themselves before the world; they have need to be constantly in evidence, and to minister to the public in just the way which the public seem to like. This is the case, not in music alone, but generally. It runs through all departments of human activity, and hence we are becoming more and more out of touch with the brave and silent souls of the past, whose work was "not for an age," but, as far as they could make it, "for all time," and who had less thought for immediate public reward than for the grandeur of their vocation and the measure of their responsibility. Such a man, pre-eminently, was Sebastian Bach, and such a man is Johannes Brahms. It is well that one of these lives in our day, to remind us of a high ideal, and to set before us an example of the supreme devotion that reckes not of present consequences, but goes steadily on in the path of duty and leaves results to fate.

The closing paragraph of Dr. Deiter's little book is not less deserving of attention than those already noticed. It follows naturally upon the one last quoted, and is not less true: "In the present day, we often hear the complaint that ideal aims and sentiments are dying out alike in life and art. In consequence, we have of late frequently and justly remarked the necessity of taking strong measures to re-awaken a taste for art, and have endeavoured, by exaggerated realism and unnatural refinement of artistic means, to force a sentiment which can no longer be excited by the calm, peaceful influence of beauty. Unfortunately, we see art, especially musical art, appealing to the basest and most superficial feelings, and, by exciting the senses, completely deadening the comprehension of the beautiful. At such a time, we should be glad and thankful that we in Germany possess one artist of genius and inventive power, of profound education, full of enthusiasm for the true aims of art, and who, deriving his inspiration from nature herself, despises everything petty and false, and earnestly seeks after the beautiful, the true, and the deeply human." To every word of our author in his sketch of the prevalent state of music we subscribe. Some amongst us have never wearied in preaching the fact in season and out of season, that "exaggerated realism" is destroying amongst us the power of feeling the "calm, peaceful, influence of beauty." The public are becoming more and more affected by the gross materialism of big orchestras, loud noises, and clap-trap effects, while more and more do they fall into the mistake of supposing that they are responsive to music when their physical senses are excited by merely physical means. This state of things tends, it is true, to check itself. There must be a limit beyond which vulgarly sensational art cannot go, and then will set in a formidable reaction. While awaiting that happy moment it is something to have amongst us a great composer who never yet "bowed the knee to Baal," or turned aside after any other false god. Such men as Brahms are the salt of our art, and keep it from utter degeneracy.

THE MATERIAL OF MUSIC.

I.

Music has been defined as the art of reproducing emotions by means of sound. It is not difficult to understand how that men in the earliest ages, when they found themselves influenced by musical sounds, and perceived that others were equally moved by their repetition, should make the effort to commit whole passages to memory; and as a help towards the accurate revival of their ideas, or for the purposes of transmitting them to posterity, should adopt a series of signs which should recall their musical inventions or memories.

The Egyptians, like the Assyrians, had no notation proper, but made use of the letters of their alphabet with certain added signs when they wished to represent musical sounds. The Hebrews, who derived their knowledge of the arts from the "learning of the Egyptians," did the same; the Greeks and the Romans employed their letters and parts of their letters for a like purpose. The amount of our present knowledge of the notations or even of the music of these early nations is limited. The instruments of music by means of which some ideas of tonality and the relative proportions of the notes of the scale could be ascertained, have all become useless, even where they exist; and unfortunately we have not yet arrived at that pitch of deductive perfection which would enable us to construct a complete musical system out of the pictures and forms of instruments provided in the frescoes and statuary of ancient nations.

There are no known examples of Assyrian or Egyptian notations, there are no early Latin compositions in existence, and only one or two fragments of ancient Greek music which have survived the wreck of time.

The word μουσική (music) was applied to all the arts and sciences over which the muses presided. When the Greeks adopted the octave system in music, through Pythagoras, who brought it from Egypt, where it had been in use for more than a thousand years before his visit to that land, harmonia (ἁρμονία) meant what we now call melody, that is to say, a succession of single sounds; while mélōs, or melody, meant a series of musical sounds as opposed to noises—in effect, harmony. The poets and others who write about music and its effects, without being in themselves practical musicians, often confuse the terms. The word mélōs has not lost all its ancient signification, for it is no uncommon thing to hear the music of Wagner's operas described as the infinite mélōs, meaning thereby the combinations of continuous sounds for the purposes of dramatic effect, as against the use, in other composers, of a formal melody lightly accompanied.

Changes in the meaning of musical terms, and ambiguities in the forms of expression, mark the history of the art from the most remote periods, as far as can be traced. They also exist in the present day. There is, in fact, no art or science in which so great a latitude of nomenclature is allowed as in music. The student of music will find little help from the sister sciences of philology, etymology, or any branch of grammar. Mathematical researches exhibit some very curious and interesting phenomena in connection with music, but mathematical theories and musical practice are not always coincident. In short, it will be perceived that the material of music is subject only to rules and observances of special import, which have been adopted out of expediency as much as from or by deliberate design. "The language of its own," which music is said to possess, is subject to few of the rules which guide the greater part of other sciences. These rules are perfectly understood in connection with music, but for the most part they will be found to be illogical if they are examined according to their general and not according to their particular application.

Anomalies may seem to exist, but they have a clear and accurate application when restricted to their use in music.

It is not proposed to trace the origin of music back to those remote periods where imagination may run riot without challenge, or to repeat those pleasant fables as to the discovery of instrumental music which are to be found in every well-padded and untrustworthy history of the art, since the days when printing made every man a potential author. It does not matter much to us now whether our splendid grand pianofortes can be traced to that primitive stringed instrument which was said to have been suggested to the primæval man who kicked music out of the dried turtle on the sea shore, or whether our wind instruments are derived from the keen Eastern breeze striking the edges of the reeds as they swayed and moaned in the blast, as human beings sway and moan under the like terrible influence in the present time. All these are fables, pretty enough in poetry, and not altogether inconsistent with the principles upon which musical terms have, in the course of time, been formulated; but they are outside the present purpose. It is proposed to deal chiefly with facts, and although it will be necessary to go back to the past to institute the first enquiries, it will be to "that tangible antiquity, whose relics show the powers then, and even now, at work."

It was mentioned, in referring to ancient Greek music, that the letters of the alphabet were used for notation in music. They were written direct, turned upside-down, or backwards, and even cut in halves, or placed slantwise. These letters show the notes only. The association of the notes with the words determined the accent. It is, therefore, certain that this notation was, to a great extent, unavailable, if not inapplicable to the needs of instrumental music. The limits of the scale then employed reduced the ambiguity as to which note was required to be produced by the voice. But as the same characters had a totally different meaning when used for instrumental music, the deduction is inevitable that the Greek system of notation was based upon illogical principles. When the value of musical combinations came to be understood, the necessity for extending the amount of the material employed was recognised. After the Lombards and Goths were established in Italy they introduced other signs, by means of which they could represent not only single sounds but combinations. The first who suggested such combinations is said to have been John of Damascus, who died about the year 750. It is quite possible, however, that his claim to the invention may be as mythical as the stories which are related of him. It is evident, however, that the influence of the Northern races effected some changes in the methods of writing music.

The Latins had allowed the Greek modes to fall into disuse at the beginning of the second century of the Christian era. In the fourth century Gaudentius speaks of them as belonging to archeological science, Boethius in the sixth century says much the same thing, and Cassiodorus, his contemporary, does not mention them at all.

The neumas (νεῦματα or πνεῦματα) which were originally, as their name implies, marks for the number of sounds which were to be given in a breath, were now submitted to a change. They were the last relics of the alphabetical musical notation which had been derived from ancient Eastern sources, and had been continued, with more or less modification, for nearly five centuries. They were signs or characters placed over the words to help the recitation.

*Scāndent. & galic. climac. tōrent. anc.
Pēnaton. tūphēn. gnomō. pōreēt. orisēul.
Virgula. cefalē. chm. quīnima. pōdatus*

Thus the point indicated the lowering of the voice, the virgula or comma, the elevation, the circumflex showed (according to its position) the elevation and depression or the reverse. This use, or method of intoning, is continued to the present day in certain churches both of the Anglican and Roman Communion, and is known by the name of the accentus

It has been stated that the use of the stave, for such we may call it, though Hucbald gave it no such name, was not general until the twelfth century, and that therefore the invention is due to that period. Men were then, as now, slow to rid themselves of the prejudices of their early education or predilection, and even though they may have felt the difficulty and embarrassment caused by the clumsi-

In the "Chronique de Corbie" for the year 986, four years before Guido was born, quoted by Gerbert in his work "De Cantu et Musica Sacra," the use of a single line is spoken of as an innovation. As progress was effected, this single line was found to be insufficient, and the addition of a line above and a line below was made, at the head of which was placed the letter signifying the note intended to be represented on the lines. This was almost identical with Hucbald's plan, though the conclusion was arrived at from different premises.

Hucbald's dots or points were unknown to the transcriber of the hymn, for the notation is a modification of certain of the neumas. The union of the two systems ultimately produced the modern notation.

Guido suggested the use of the syllables falling upon the various notes of the Hymn of Paul the Deacon, for use in what was afterwards called Solmisation. The syllable Ut is in use in France to this day:—

Ut queant laxis, Resonare fibris,
Mira gestorum, Famuli tuorum,
Solve polluti, Labi reatum Sancte Johannes.

Some writers have asserted that Guido chose these syllables for the names of his Scale. Guido never uses the word scale, he uses the word hexachord always. There are only six notes in the so-called scale. Moreover, Guido speaks of the seven musical degrees, he would therefore hardly be likely to contradict himself upon so important a point. He compares the seven notes to the days of the week which, being ended, recommence in the same manner with the same names. He does not claim to have invented the scale. He suggests to a brother monk the means whereby he can recall to memory the melody sung to the hymn by reproducing the first notes of the hexachord at each line of the first verse.

The lowest note of his hexachordal system was marked with the Greek Gamma, hence the tern gamut (γαμπα, Ut), a barbarous mixture of tongues as applied to the scale or succession of sounds.

The names of the notes in Guido's hexachord were ut, re, mi, fa, sol, la. The seventh note of our present scale, though known and practised, had no name until five hundred years afterwards, when Ericus Puteanus, a Fleming, suggested the syllable si, the initial letters of the words Sancte Johannes. About the year 1640 John Baptist Doni, of Florence, suggested the substitution of the syllable do for ut, which was accepted and adopted. The further suggestion that the second syllable of his name, "ni," should be used for the seventh degree of the scale was not favourably received. The Germans continue to use the letters of the Alphabet, the Italians French, Spanish and Portuguese use the Guidonian syllables, and the English employ both letters and the syllables suggested by Guido, with Doni's modification.

In this observance of the practice of naming each line of his stave Guido was not original. But in omitting some of the letters at the head, and reserving others, he confirmed if he did not institute a custom which was the origin of the present use. The letters retained were F, C, and G, and these were placed upon any line required to indicate the key—hence the term clef or clavis as applied to the character which serves to distinguish the pitch of the notes on the stave. In modern music change of tonality is indicated by certain signs which represent the key or pitch, and the key means something more than the clef, and the clef suggests a subordinate idea to the key.

In the days of Guido the chief use of written characters in music was to preserve the purity of the Ecclesiastical Melodies. Four hundred years before Pope Gregory had found how that the simplicity of the Old Church Song had become corrupted by variety of use. His desire to give a standard of purity brought a recognised method of writing music into use. By this means the corruptions instituted by the voice and ear could be corrected by an appeal to the eye. Pope Gregory further enlarged the borders of musical expression by adjusting the number of tones or modes in conformity with that which we now call the natural scale. His seven species of diapason were only scales formed by taking each note of the scale and singing by degrees to the octave, taking care not to change the position of the tones and semitones.

Notwithstanding the existence of a written code for reference, the Gregorian song was in constant danger of corruption, because men preferred to trust to their fancy rather than to adhere to facts, and in their levity and inattention so perverted the purity of the text, that frequent "applications were made to the Court of Rome by the Princes of Europe expressing their fears that the later Gregorians were in danger of being lost, and praying its interposition in order to its restoration" (Hawkins).

The existing manuscripts of these early periods show nothing of uniformity in the methods of writing musical characters. The neumes and points were used apparently according to the predilection of the scribe, and not because there was a standard method. Treatises were written and theories propounded. Out of the many proposals a few of the ideas commended themselves and became adopted from expediency. The opinions of musicians began to assume definite forms of expression about the twelfth century. The authoritative views of Guido had their effect in concentrating and formulating musical knowledge, and men began to adopt some degree of uniformity of writing. This uniformity was hampered by the variety of names given to the same thing by people of different localities. They appeared to regard the study of music as a mystery, and to load its simplicity with the terms of occult art.

It was not until the fourteenth century that the advantage of a general system of signs and terms was recognised and practised by musicians. The mystifications which overloaded the definitions of the art, and which even now form stumbling-blocks in the path of intelligibility, were indulged in to a large extent by the writers of the middle ages. They appear to have been influenced by a desire to reduce the practice to a science, instead of recognising the science of the practice. The philosophy of the art had more charms for them than the present effects of its exercise.

Hucbald's lines form the stave, from his points the notes were made, the union of the neumata and the points gave the necessary variety of shapes to the notes, and from certain modifications of the neumata the signs for silence were derived. The exact period when the neumes were changed into notes cannot now be determined. The practice was called "quadrating," that is to say, squaring. The squared notes filled the spaces between the lines at first, and in course of time, in obedience to a process of reasoning similar to that which produced the changes in the use of Hucbald's discoveries, the squared notes were placed upon the lines, and thus the form of the stave was restricted.

When two sounds were required to be given to one syllable the ligature was employed. This marked an advance in the practice of writing music, and although it was liable to a considerable amount of variable interpretation, the different reading to which it was likely to be subjected would not create a large amount of misunderstanding. It must be remembered that in the far distant days when this form of notation was employed, all music was a sort of barbaric melody, subject to no other rhythmical constraint than that which was necessary to give due emphasis to the words employed. The melodies themselves were not of the definite character which belongs to tunes written in modern notation, but they were a kind of chant probably delivered in what is colloquially called a "sing-song" tone. The fixed position of a note to the eye gave rise to a fixed method of representing its sound by the voice. The existence of a note with a distinct name, occupying a stated place, did not thereby imply the collateral existence of a fixed pitch. The probability is that each singer chose his own pitch according to his voice, and in writing his melodies he shifted the clef marking the key-note either high or low, according to the compass of the melody.

THE GREAT COMPOSERS

By JOSEPH BENNETT.

No. XXIV.—HÉROLD.

AMONG French musicians there are few more interesting figures than the composer of "Zampa" and "Le Pré aux Clercs." Alike in his successes and his disappointments, Hérold attracts regard and sympathy, and both as artist and man he deserves a place in our now far-extended series of biographical sketches.

Louis Joseph Ferdinand Hérold was born in Paris (30, Rue des Grands Augustins), on January 28, 1791. His family seems to have been of German origin, and possibly not unconnected with the composer Jean Hérold, who flourished in the Fatherland towards the close of the sixteenth century. Genealogical details upon this and other points are not available, but we know that François Hérold, father of Joseph, was the son of an organist, an Alsatian by birth, and a German by education. At an early age he removed to Hamburg, devoted himself to music, and became a favourite pupil of Emmanuel Bach, then a resident in, and a distinguished ornament of, the Free City. In 1781 François settled down in Paris, where his skill as a teacher soon gave him a good position, and where he remained till his death in 1802, when his son, destined to far greater distinction, was eleven years old. The elder Hérold belonged to a somewhat distinguished circle in the French capital. Amongst his friends were Sebastian Erard, of pianoforte fame, and Louis Adam, father of Adolphe of that ilk. Adam became the godfather of Hérold, who thus had the advantage from birth of connections favourable to his advancement in the art for which, as soon appeared, providence had destined him.

Fétis, who became one of young Hérold's masters, states ("Biographie Universelle des Musiciens") that the boy's father opposed his adoption of music as a profession. "His father did not intend him to follow the same profession as himself, and despite the happy disposition he showed towards music, his education was not so carried on as to develop it." A later biographer, Jouvin, contests this, remarking:—"Mr. Fétis, followed by others, is wrong in saying that the father of our composer did not intend him for a musical career. Far from being crossed, the vocation of the child was encouraged." Probably Jouvin is nearer the truth than Fétis, but we cannot wonder at misstatements on this head, since it seems to be generally understood, with regard to musicians, that their fathers try to turn them into another course. When eleven years old Hérold was sent to a school kept by a Mr. Hix, near the Champs Elysées, and reputed to be one of the best in Paris. By a curious chance, Fétis, then a pupil at the Conservatoire, lodged in the same house, and gave Hix's scholars their lessons in solfeggi. The two were thus brought together, and Fétis testifies to the extraordinary gifts of his young friend. Hérold had scarcely to labour at music; he divined it instinctively, and soon acquired the reputation of a brilliant pupil, not in art only, but also in classics and rhetoric.

Young Hérold was passing his holidays at Sévres, in a house belonging to the Erards, when news arrived of his father's death. He was an exceedingly sensitive lad, and so delicate that more than a suspicion existed of his having inherited the malady which killed François Joseph. Friends sought, therefore, to conceal from him the loss he had sustained. But a thoughtless word at table made all known, and then the grief of the boy was terrible to see. Jouvin states that his sufferings were far beyond those usually experienced at so tender an age, and adds, "they so struck and impressed themselves upon the memory of the persons present that, more than half-a-century later, a witness of the child's despair could recount the smallest details to the illustrious composer's son." On the decease of the father it became needful to think seriously about what should be done with the child. Some were for placing him in a Government office, where he was assured of protection and advancement by the then Minister of the Interior. But Hérold shrank from such a career. He felt himself called to music, and the impression was shared by others when, in 1802, a composition from his boyish pen excited notice and admiration at a school fête. His mother carried the little work to Grétry, who, with his usual kindness, took the trouble to examine it. "This is full of faults," said the master, "but let him go on; you can reckon upon his future." Hearing this the mother went home happy, with all her doubts resolved. It is interesting to know that Madame Hérold lived to see her son famous, and survived him twenty-seven years, dying in 1860 at the age of ninety.

In 1806, having finished his education under Hix, Hérold entered the Conservatoire, where his godfather, Louis Adam, taught him the piano, Catel being his master in harmony, and Kreutzer for the violin. The lad made rapid progress, which, as regards the pianoforte, can be tested by the distinctions gained. In 1808 he was an accessit; in 1809 he took second prize, carrying off the first in 1810 by the performance of a Sonata composed by himself. This, Mr. Jouvin tells us, was sufficiently a rare occurrence to be noticed in the public journals. One writer, curiously enough, complained of Hérold as showing bad taste in testifying possession of a double talent where the Conservatoire expected evidence only of one. This person must have been the very incarnation of red tape. In 1811 the lad became a pupil of Méhul for composition, and entered upon a close friendship with that famous musician, who at once saw the talent he possessed. Hérold, we are told, loved his master as one loves a father, and Fétis declares: "The lessons of that great composer, and still more perhaps his piquant and enlightened conversation, exercised the happiest influence upon the development of his faculties. His progress was that of a man born to be an artist."

One year after placing himself under Méhul, Hérold competed for the Grand Prix de Rome. Nobody, except, perhaps, his dear master, expected that he would get it; all eyes being fixed upon one Cazot, who had carried off the second prize in 1811. Cazot himself looked upon the matter as settled beforehand. He was certain to be the lucky youth, and proceeded to discount his success with much vainglory. Alas, for Cazot! His was the pride that goeth before a fall. One day while the competition was in full progress, Hérold came out of his loge. "Have you given up?" was the cry. "No, no," exclaimed the lad, "but I have finished." He had completed his cantata, "Mdlle. de la Vallière," and that work extinguished Cazot, while making its composer a burning and a shining light among the musical youth of France.

Hérold set out for Rome in due course, studying there for a year and afterwards going on to Naples, where he taught the piano to the daughters of Murat, and found himself in the congenial society of men like Paisiello, Zingarelli, and Mayer. Hérold was still at Naples in 1815, when he produced his first stage work, "La Gioventù d' Enrico Quinto" ("The Youth of Henry V."), founded upon a drama by Alexander Duval, who, in turn, took his materials from Shakespeare. The production of an Italian opera in Naples by a French composer was considered a remarkable event, evidence of which may be found in Hérold's own account of the performance, which we here translate from his journal:—

"At last behold me on the point of appearing before the public. I am astonished to find that appetite does not fail me to-day, especially as for three days I have been able neither to eat nor sleep. I dine very well, since fate so decrees. That function discharged, I dress myself in black (sign of mourning), and am at the theatre two hours before anybody else. What an idea, when darkness comes on and the lamps are lighted, to say 'I shall never again see the sun without being thoroughly content or equally ashamed!' The public arrive, the actors cough and hem, the violins are tuned; I tremble in all my limbs. The signal is given, the overture begins; the thing is done. January 5, 1815. You cannot imagine what a state I am in."

"The overture is greatly applauded, though they are not much accustomed to listen to overtures in Italy. The curtain rises, I fear that an actor will make a false step, that a scene will fall, that an attendant will forget to have a torch ready, and so on. O what moments! The introduction is also much applauded. Then comes Henry's air; it is received with three rounds, and I being at the piano am obliged to salute the public. I declare that made amends for much trouble. What other art brings such lively delights!"

"The quintet which followed had obtained the greatest success at rehearsal. The artists of the orchestra foretold that it would go straight to the mark. 'Alle stelle, alle stelle, maestro!' Not at all. The piece was received quite coldly. I have spoken of it to Italians, who tell me that it is not musical enough. I dispute their opinion and explain to those who will listen. The tavern-keeper's air followed and that of Bettina—little success; however, at the second performance, the first-named having been 'cut,' it did very well. I even had the pleasure of hearing the theme sung by the audience as they retired. The Lesson duet was much applauded, but certain passages for the second woman, which she sang badly, gave me cruel apprehensions. The Finale came, and was well received, although the little chorus at the end went badly."

"The second act began. The second tenor's air passed, as well as the little duet, without exciting opposition. Then came the prima donna's air, which was applauded in lively fashion. Then came something else and gave me great pleasure. It was the Court. Oh! how I breathed again! Applause was prohibited—so much the worse; but so was hissing—so much the better. The sestet would, I fancy, have been applauded, but the last Finale made everybody smile, and I quite believe that, the Court absent, there would have been loud laughter. With all respect to the Neapolitans, I think them in the wrong. Here is the situation: Henry, ashamed of all that had just taken place, says to his companion, 'My friends, retire without noise; let nobody speak of what has happened. Silence! Silence!' In consequence I composed a very short, soft piece. Everyone was astonished, and they said, 'It cannot finish like that!' Then the curtain fell. The next morning I wrote a noisy Finale, and the public was satisfied, but not myself. I recognise my faults better than anybody, and I promise you to profit by the advice I have received, but never will I admit that my Finale was bad. Let common-sense judge it."

Remarking upon the last paragraph, M. Jouvin indulges a taste for sarcasm. After pointing out that common-sense is no more on the judgment-seat now than in 1815, he proceeds: "A composer eager for applause, still writes and always will write his 'Combattons' and 'Marchons' for choristers who stand quite still in rows, and Finales accompanied by the full strength of the orchestra upon 'Silence' and 'Let us withdraw in quiet.' The spectator who does not get a headache at the hearing of an operatic Finale never spares, on quitting his seat, the musician who has spared his ears. He returns home well in health but discontented and saying, 'Pooh! very small music.'" We must make another quotation from Hérold's own remarks upon his first opera, because they show the admirable spirit of the young man, and how free he was from the blindness of self-conceit: "The great fault I have committed," he wrote to a friend, "consists in having attempted too much. But I have one great consolation—all the famous masters who have heard my opera give me much encouragement. Mayer, since that time, has had the exceeding goodness to take me into his friendship, and to speak well of me on all hands. Paisiello also found good in the work, but said that it 'smacked too much of the school,' and he is quite right. I shall profit by this first attempt in order to do something remarkable by-and-by." There remains to add, as regards Hérold's Neapolitan opera, that it had several representations, and achieved extraordinary success at a time when Italians professed, and perhaps felt, the greatest contempt for French musicians.

Several letters have been published as written by Hérold to his mother just before and after the performance of the opera, but they are largely taken up with the circumstances detailed above. One or two extracts may, however, throw some light upon the young composer's character. On January 5, 1815, he wrote: "My dear Mother; I am very late in writing to you, but I have good excuses; I desired to wish you a happy New Year in a manner somewhat distinguished, and I send you two things as gifts—the success of my opera and thirteen hundred francs which you will receive at Goupy's. Of this sum, I beg you to take a thousand francs for yourself, and give three hundred to my uncle, wishing him, on my part, bonne année." What this thoughtful act indicates we all know and appreciate. In another letter we get Hérold's evidence regarding some of the musicians around him: "I have fallen into one error here—that of neglecting M. Paisiello. But I shall repair it, and my excuse is that my music is altogether in the taste of Mozart. Paisiello would have found it bad, or, at least, he would have thought so. Moreover, the first composer of Italy—Mayer—has shown himself altogether in favour of my style, and I could not consult, at the same time, two persons so opposed in taste. But I can say that I study much the music of Paisiello and find it delicious. As for M. Zingarelli, he is the avowed enemy of all that is not catholic, apostolic, and Roman. The 'Creation,' 'Don Juan,' 'Iphigénie en Tauride,' 'La Vestale,' &c., are monstrous in his eyes. Why? Because he has not written them. So much the worse for little Pio, if M. Zingarelli alone has charge of his musical education." These are interesting glimpses of the men who sixty years ago made Naples famous as a musical city.

From under the shadow of Vesuvius, Hérold moved northward, on the whole well satisfied with himself and the measure of fame he had been lucky enough to secure at a first stroke. His destination was Vienna, where he ultimately arrived after many adventures. The year was 1815, the "Corsican tyrant" had broken loose, and Frenchmen were suspected everywhere out of their own country. But Hérold pushed on towards the Austrian capital with the resoluteness of a Napoleon, and at last entered the desired city. Even then his troubles were not over. He was still a Frenchman among enemies and could only obtain peace by persuading old Salieri and, when the Congress opened, Prince Talleyrand, to answer for his being merely a harmless musician.

M. Jouvin, to whom Hérold's diary was confided for the purpose of his biography, has not published it in its entirety, and he seems to think that its unliterary qualities afford a legitimate reason why it should not be printed. But the very evidence which tends to show that Hérold had no notion of making a book is proof of its interest and value. The contents of such a diary, however hastily expressed and badly proportioned, are the writer's own genuine thoughts and feelings hot, so to speak, from his brain and heart. M. Jouvin has, however, given a considerable number of extracts, some of which are worth notice here. In one, for example, we find Hérold's impressions of the Lenten services in Rome—those which Mendelssohn and others have described with so much point and vivacity:—

"At last I go to hear the famous 'Miserere' at the Sistine Chapel—the Miserere for which I have expressly travelled sixty leagues. I am not sorry, as it is a magnificent thing. I had been told that it was a marvel, a miracle, something wholly angelic, of a kind which I could not even imagine. All these fine words had made me smile, but the fact is that the 'Misereres' are very fine. That which they performed this evening is the work of an old master named Allegri. It is music entirely harmonic, with a succession of retards. There are two quartets, which sing the strophes alternately. After each strophe, a verse of the 'Miserere' is 'psalmodised,' and at the end the eight voices come together with all their force. There is no accompaniment. I noticed that the pitch dropped at least a tone. . . The music derives a particular character from the fact that it has no measure. It moves slowly, without rhythm, and without determinate cadences. The gathering shades of night, the prostrate priests and people, the profound silence, the grandeur of the chapel, and the obscurity of the place, all contributed to produce an extraordinary effect. The chapel is excellent for voices, being extremely sonorous. The crowd was immense. The great number of strangers who had come from all parts to assist at the ceremony and in hope of seeing the Pope—a rare spectacle—made the scene more impressive. We waited, from moment to moment, the arrival of the Holy Father; but it was in vain. Political affairs were troublesome at the time, and no one knew what to think of the delay. He did not come, and on leaving the chapel we ascertained that he had gone away. This news caused great excitement; everybody went home and made the 'Miserere' a pièce de circonstance. . . This moment I have received pleasant news—namely, that the 'Gioventù di Enrico' has been played at the San Carlo, and that it made a good effect. So much the better! I will now go and see whether this information can keep me from sleeping. Bon soir."

Hérold left Rome on April 1, 1815, accompanied beyond the walls by his fellow-students of the Villa Medici, and made his way to Florence, whence, after a short stay, he departed for Bologna. There the peaceful musician found himself in the midst of war. Murat had declared for his old chief, Napoleon, at the beginning of the Hundred Days, and his Neapolitans were skirmishing with the Austrians before Bologna and Modena. Hérold immensely admired the courage and sangfroid of the crowned cavalrman, and mentions an instance of both: "This morning the king went out to reconnoitre, and some concealed Austrians fired a volley at him. He was only forty paces distant, but they missed him. The king took off his hat to them and rode away at a gallop. Lately, because the soldiers would not work at the intrenchments with balls whistling about their ears, the king sat on the ground before them, and thus shamed them out of their fear." A fortnight in Bologna was quite enough, but in that time he was made a member of the Philharmonic Society, and composed a symphony by way of acknowledgment. The diary shows, too, that he came across Rossini: "I have seen Rossini, a young composer who, at this moment, is making a devil of a reputation in Italy." The entry stops with these few words, but Rossini was destined in after time largely to influence the French master's career.

From Bologna, Hérold went to Milan, where he endured rather than enjoyed life. "If the music is bad," he wrote, "the bread is good," and that was one set-off against the annoyances to which he was subjected both as a musician and as a traveller worried about passports by a suspicious police. The Milan experiences seem to have been the proverbial last straw. At any rate, Hérold's amiability gave way, and he confided to his diary an angry tirade against Italy and the Italians:—

"They boast much about the passion of the Italians for all kind of stage shows. Let us see about this. Is it love of spectacle that makes them receive company and eat and drink in the boxes while the piece is proceeding. Is it enthusiasm for the theatre to have a large salle like that of the Seraphin in Paris, and give opera twice a week here, in a city like Bologna? What if I speak of Florence, where one cannot distinguish if the action is in the house or on the stage? I say nothing about Rome; people there are given up to gambling and the giostre. But look at the stupidity of men who risk assassination at every mile, and encounter the fatigues of a painful journey in order to say 'I have seen'? What? This beautiful Italy! This Garden of Europe! Yes, this beautiful Italy, where one dies of cold in winter, or is stifled with heat in summer. However, I am going to leave it, this enchanting spot."

In this grumbling frame of mind, Hérold left Milan for Venice, where he heard Rossini's "L'Italiana in Algeri," and also the male soprano, Vellutti, whose powers were then on the wane. What he thought of the first is not stated, but his opinion about the second may be gathered from a single sentence: "The trumpets, trombones, and drums prevented me from hearing the orchestra, and the extremely bad roudades of the great booby, Vellutti, prevented me from hearing the singing." That the composer was much interested by Venice goes without saying; he had, however, to stay there much longer than he desired. It was the old passport trouble again. Day after day he applied to the police for the necessary document and day after day they put him off. Their dull routine-mastered minds could not take in the idea that a Frenchman wished to cross the path of the armies marching against Napoleon without some nefarious purpose. In vain Hérold represented that he was a peaceful musician anxious to reach the Austrian capital for purposes connected with his art. The functionaries knew better, and, as they had no grounds for absolutely refusing the passport, they fell back upon the policy of delay. "Come again to-morrow" was all that Hérold could get out of them. For a time he bore this with patience, because in Venice a man can generally endure the existence of obstacles to his departure. Our young composer entered into the life of the city, so strange, picturesque, and sui generis, but after awhile its attractions waned. Hérold's thoughts went on to the City of the Masters, where he knew not what triumphs awaited him, and he fretted sorely against the bars of his beautiful prison. "Let me go" he cried to the police, who would only answer, "We are investigating your case, come again to-morrow." At last he lost all patience, and took a resolution the gravity of which he could hardly have known. The Austrian police in Italy was not a power to be trifled with. It had ways of its own, and they were very hard ways for offenders. However, Hérold, as he could not travel with a passport, determined to do so without one, and on May 16, 1815, stole out of Venice, the legitimate prey of any functionary who might challenge his right.

SONGS.

At this festive season of the year music forms the strong element in social gatherings. Compositions, good, bad, and indifferent, soothe or excite, lull or torment the listening ear. Each one who sings, or who thinks he can, or who is flattered by his friends into the exercise of vocal power, has his song or two, which he "lets off" on every possible occasion. The influence of the moment palliates many an effort of bad taste or thoughtlessness. The kindly help towards whiling away the long hours of the winter evening which is offered by those who "bring their music with them in a friendly way" ought not to be undervalued. But this question suggests itself—Could not something be done towards awakening in the minds of those who have the power and the will, the desire to make their ministrations in the dissolution of dulness of permanent profit in the months to come, when the evenings are not long, and the love for music finds few opportunities for exercise? Would it not be possible to induce amateurs to select pieces which may have something more than a passing effect? It is true that there is a great temptation to indulge in the last new song, as sung by the "great tenor, Mr. Chestnuts," or the "well known baritone, Mr. Leatherlungs," each of whom has guaranteed his living interest in certain songs, and has given them, as it were, a warranty, a cachet, by appending his signature to the title-pages. The choice of these things of course saves much trouble, and helps to cover a multitude of sins in the singer. What is wanted, however, is for the intelligent amateur to exercise his own judgment, and to make his vocal repertory a matter of as much consideration as the choice of his coat, or the important duty of looking after his health in the matter of "what to eat, drink, or avoid."

In the matter of music there is much that may be called "levelling upwards." The tastes of amateurs are the guide of the professional. If the songs constantly issued from the press were not as constantly bought there would be an end to the business. Those who are prominently before the public have proved to a certain extent somewhat uncertain in their trustworthiness as musical guides. It is time that, in the matter of songs, for instance, a change should be effected. Why should amateur singers continue to sing songs whose words are more or less an insult to their reasoning powers? Why should not the song be selected for other qualities besides its melody and easy accompaniment? Why should the long winter evening be made an excuse for the perpetuation of weak, flabby, worthless, and often mischievous verses allied to music? Our amateurs and domestic musicians have eaten of the tree of knowledge and can judge between the good and the evil for themselves without prompting. Let them bring common-sense to their aid and not follow an indifferent leader like a flock of sheep. The gain to art would be great out of such an effort. It will be impossible to exclude all that is valueless. The history of art proves the futility of any attempt of the sort. Something should be done towards showing posterity that we are not such fools as we look as far as the majority of the songs of the present day is concerned. Encouragement should be offered to all who are striving to get out of the beaten track, so that we may leave something to show that we are not worse, even if we are not better, than our fathers.

The wits of the song writers of a period run in grooves. No sooner has one discovered, or has fallen upon, a sentiment, an expression, or an idea, than all the rest of the poetasters follow with some variation of the theme. Ingenuity stands in the place of invention, and the one thought which had found approval in popular fancy makes a complete circuit under different guises. The Chloes, the Strephons, the Phillises, and the Corydons, and the sham sentimentality and artificial pastorals which they represented, retarded the progress of popular song for more than a century. When Dibdin's vigorous verse fell upon the wearied ear, the rhymesters were roused to an activity which, however, only spent itself in copying the words selected, without attempting to improve upon them, or to extend the lines in the direction already laid down. Dibdin had all the genius necessary to make a national poet for England, but the fact that he was a musician as well, removes him from the parallel with the Scottish Burns on which he should have been placed as an Englishman. His verses and songs did not influence the manner of contemporary poets so much as might have been expected. They were felt to be inimitable. There was nothing unreal in them, and therefore nothing which could be seized and made a mania of. At the beginning of the present century manliness seems to have been replaced by morbid melancholy. The songs were of madness and disappointed love. These subjects were favourable to artificiality, and so they flourished for awhile, leaving traces of their existence in the influences they exercised over subsequent works, and a high-water stain, as it were, on the literature of their time as a record of the height of the flood of folly. Each successive generation has left a foolish line upon its song literature, and the many marks suggest reflections of a somewhat saddened character.

Time was when the song books contained songs, ballads, verses, and fancies which were "not for an age, but for all time." It cannot be denied that there are many effusions which have been admitted to the pages of those same books which show that the current of popularity has sometimes rolled through the borders of the imbecile and the undesirable and carried some of their soil into sweeter and more wholesome lands. But there has been no age, until the present, which has not left a legacy of beautiful or stirring verse, be it small or great, for the admiration and envy of posterity.

Time was when the best of our poets were not surprised to find one of their readiest methods of appeal to the sympathies of their contemporaries through the song. Delicacy of thought, sweetness and charm of expression are to be found in the lyrics of Shakespeare, of Ben Jonson, whose "Drink to me only" has been pronounced "divinely sweet"; of George Withers, of Herrick, of Shirley, of Carew, of Lovelace, of Chalkhill and his "choicely good" "O the sweet contentment"; of Cowley, and others of their age. Their very names seem to breathe an air of invigorating freshness, and it is no wonder that the musicians of the present day, wearied and worn with the stifling atmosphere of stupidity and artificiality, should turn with a sigh of relief to the older poets and find in their verses the sympathetic chord which vibrates in tune with their own aspirations.

Time was when poets wrote harmonious verses, when the songs themselves were almost their own music; when they could be made to sing, as it were, out of their own melody. The reader of the present day is filled with amazement at the genius of the song writers of the past, and he marvels why it is that wit, fancy, elegance, and power seem to have deserted the pens of those who now supply the musician with the medium of communication between themselves and the public. It is no stretch of the truth to say that the composers of the present can supply as good and as singable music as any of those of the past, whose earlier efforts have been fortunate enough to descend to a later generation on the wings of fame. It is a melancholy fact that while there are songs enough produced to fill many volumes of words alone, there is scarcely the ghost of an elevated thought among the whole number. They are marred in their imagery, their form of expression is childish when it is not irreverent, their sentimentality is a sham.

There are scarcely more than a dozen songs produced in as many years that kindle in the breast of the hearer a feeling higher than contempt, ridicule, or disgust. The lackadaisical ditty dealing with the dead kitten, the roofless house, the farm without the cow, the apotheosis of the shoeblack with its triplet accompaniment on the higher part of the pianoforte keyboard, may fit the fancies of the ultra-sentimental. The severe domestic afflictions in the shape of Babie, Girlie, Boyie, Nursie, Toffie, Candie, &c., may suit the palates of many, while the imperative demands on the part of the poet to "Lay him on the upper shelf," to "Close the shutters, all sold out," or "Come no more when daylight lingers," "Willie's cut his two front fingers," may appeal with irresistible power to the souls of a certain class of the lovers of ballads as they are called, and may possibly find an echo in the "hollow hearts that wear a mask," but are there any reasonable beings who have ever asked themselves why their fancy has been led captive by that class of song which passes with the world as belonging to the sea? In these the whole of the wit seems to be centred in the mysterious words, "Yo ho, my boys," occurring more frequently than is required by any known canons of the poetic art. It is not proposed here to ask the pertinent question as to why the vocalists of the day do not disdain to stand up before the public and degrade their art, and their own artistic positions, by blandly declaiming such nonsense with all the power and charm which experience and natural gifts can impart to it. These are matters which probably concern their banking account more than any artistic relations. It may be that artists are at the mercy of the versifiers and their musical coadjutors, and are compelled to "take the goods the gods provide," without entering into the question of art at all. There can be no doubt but that future generations will look with pity, not to say commiseration, upon the present generation, not as a songless race, but as a race content and satisfied with verses having for the most part neither wit, reason, grace, grammar, sentiment, nor common-sense.

THE great and well-merited success of "John Inglesant" has naturally attracted attention to every subsequent effort from the pen of Mr. Shorthouse. The latest of these is, by its title—"A teacher of the Violin"—especially calculated to interest musicians. The scene is laid in Germany, and the reader cannot fail to be at once struck by the extraordinarily slipshod way in which the foreign words are spelt. Such forms as fräulein [passim], and Graffinn or Graffin, bespeak either ignorance on the part of the writer or some carelessness on that of the editor of Macmillan. The very name of the violin teacher himself, Herr Veitch, is an impossible form as a German word. Setting aside the faulty orthography of the story, we find the hero peculiarly susceptible to the sounds of nature, in most of which he discovered some spiritual import. The organ in church failed to touch him, it somehow seemed wanting in that supreme searching power of the forest and the wind. More marked was the impression made on him by some wandering zither players, of whose instruments he says, not too clearly—"They were regulated each at a certain interval of pitch, probably in a few octaves in the middle region of the scale." At last a first-rate violin player revealed to him the possibilities of art. In reply to a query of this artist, we read how the hero remarked that he "had played on no instrument save picking out harmonious thirds on an old harpsichord at the parsonage house." Mr. Shorthouse talks of octaves in a most curious way—e.g., "the high treble octaves of the violin," and again the "shrill clear surging chords of the higher octaves," when he means notes or register. Later on he describes a trio and says: "The great charm of the piece lay in some perfectly modulated chords of great beauty distributed through all the parts in a sustained broad searching tone on the fourth string." Here again is rather a perplexing account of the state of mind of the princess while listening to a trio of Corelli's: "Should she listen to this siren chord, it might even happen to her to lose that stainless insight which its wild tone had itself evoked; but, in the perfection of a concerted piece, its wild uniqueness was kept by grace of finished art in pitch and vibration true to the dominant concord of pure harmony, an existence and creation as it were in harmonious sound, of which it formed a part." This, however, is quite surpassed by the following sentence: "The wayward music that strayed through the leaves, and the fine clear notes of the nightingales that harmonised in their high shrill octaves (sic) with the cold silver light in which valley and river and stone terrace lay in mystic unreality, seemed like a fatal spell to enslave my spirit, a ghostly melody, a pale beckoning hand to entice me on." If Mr. Shorthouse has sought to conceal an ignorance of the elements of music beneath all this fine array of high falutin' verbiage, he may be congratulated upon the success of his efforts.

It is sometimes said that the prima donna fever, to which the public were so liable in past days, is rapidly abating. That its outbreaks have been few of late we must admit, but whether this arises from a better conception of the dignity of art, or from the scarcity of prime donne is a question very much open to discussion. At any rate, traces of the disease still linger amongst, and are generally found in the track of Madame Adelina Patti, whose movements unfailingly cause it to break out. Of late Madame Patti has been the subject of as many reports as the gigantic gooseberry of a dull season. Burglars have tried to get at her jewels, but only succeeded in walking off with articles belonging to Mr. Nicolini. She has made up her mind to sell the Welsh castle where this indignity was perpetrated. She has made up her mind (so states another authority) to do nothing of the kind; the fact being that while absent from England she will sigh for Craig-y-Nos. She went to Paris awhile ago, and spent "two whole days and nights" in trying on costumes which, with other portable property, are now packed away in forty trunks. People who wish to hear her in Brazil will have to pay £3 for a front seat and £1 for a place behind. A Rio Grande speculator, having an address, we should say, at the lunatic asylum, has offered her £5,000 in gold for one performance. Madame Patti has refused the tempting offer. So the stories run—the foregoing are but a sample—and as the appetite for them appears to be unlimited, so, no doubt, is the supply. The conclusion suggests itself that public interest and enthusiasm are as prompt to centre in a prima donna as ever. Madame Patti is an old attraction; we have only to see the advent of the new artist who will continue the line of great prime donne in order to witness an outbreak of heroine worship which shall be, perhaps, all the more severe for long immunity from provocation.

ACCORDING to a Baltimore contemporary, "‘Melopede’ is the name of a musical bicycle, so fashioned that the rider can kick out melodious waltzes and reels as he travels along the road." From time to time we have commented, in the pages of THE MUSICAL TIMES, upon these senseless inventions, and have often wondered whether paragraphs announcing the construction of such machines were not mere canards. Perhaps the "wish" may have been "father to the thought"; for, to say nothing of artists, assuredly no sane person would imagine that any pleasure can be given, either to performer or listener, by blowing "tunes" out of a cigar, extracting a series of sounds from pieces of rock, or playing "waltzes and reels" with your feet whilst journeying along the high road. Yet we are informed that instruments for all these purposes are manufactured, although we have never yet met with any person who possessed one. That many, however, do purchase and practise upon eccentric instruments, whilst neglecting those universally recognised, is proved by the fact of amateurs patronising the banjo, the ocarina, the zither, and several others, upon which it need scarcely be said that it is utterly absurd to suppose any composition worth hearing can possibly be performed. The banjo is, we happen to know, cultivated most extensively, and private Concerts are frequently given devoted exclusively to the performance of works written and arranged for this instrument. Of course there can be no reason why persons who imagine that they have discovered qualities in the banjo which are not possessed by better known instruments should not glory in them, and even be proud to display them to their friends; but there is a "fashion" in being singular, and it must be remembered that it is infinitely easier to be a first-rate performer on the banjo than a second-rate performer on any instrument of more general acceptance.

THE success of little Hofmann in the United States (where, according to his manager, he is a bigger "draw" than Patti) is giving rise to all sorts of stories in which he plays the hero. We hope that some of them are not true. Perhaps we should use more confident language, and say that many are no doubt examples of transatlantic inventiveness; but, however this may be, we do trust that the tale reproduced by an evening contemporary has no foundation in fact. Here is the most notable passage: "At the first rehearsal which he had with the musicians at the Metropolitan Opera-house, prior to his first public appearance in New York, the members of the orchestra were perfectly astonished at his playing. They were still more so when he stopped them in the middle of a Beethoven Sonata (sic) and directed Mr. Neuendorff to tell the clarinet to play more softly. He also told the well-known Conductor how the time should be beaten as the orchestra were not playing properly. It must have been a revelation to the musicians, who were all soloists, to be reprimanded for their work by a child, however talented, ten years of age." All who know little Hofmann, and are acquainted with his frank, boyish nature, so free from self-consciousness and presumption, will find this tale as hard to credit as we do. Such priggishness and impertinence as are here ascribed to him are entirely foreign to his nature, and it is particularly worthy of notice that, before his first Concert, he had not been long enough in New York to be spoiled by the adulation which an American public knows so well how to lavish upon its favourites. That the clarinet was playing too loudly in a Beethoven Sonata is, of course, absurd, and absurd, from our point of view, appears to be the entire tale.

THE music critics attached to some of our important suburban newspapers are often condemned to hide their light under a bushel when it should be set upon a hill. In speaking of a Festival at a church in Paddington, where Mendelssohn's "Hymn of Praise" was given, when we read that "The Symphony was played on the organ throughout with extraordinary interpretative and executive ability"; we pause in silence before a superior presence. "The rendering of the beautiful and pathetic chorus 'All ye that cried unto the Lord' was most touching and impressive. Again the entire scene of the Watchman was most pictorially given, although the tenor was suffering from a cold." Further, when we find that "The crux of the whole work is undoubtedly the chorus 'The night is departing,' a dangerous vortex in which many a choir has been hopelessly engulfed, the band and organist alone remaining above water. It was in this case successfully weathered, to the credit of all concerned," we are overwhelmed with the force of his imagery. But when we learn that "The service was not concluded until a quarter-past ten, a drawback which suggests on another occasion the omission of the Symphony, which is not so organically connected with the Cantata as is the instrumental prelude in its prototype, Beethoven's Choral Symphony," we feel that all musical criticism has been wrong hitherto, and that the eminent gentlemen who direct that kind of literature for the daily press have never shown such historical knowledge, such judgment, and such critical acumen as is perforce restrained in its lucubrations to a suburban print.

SACRED HARMONIC SOCIETY.

THOSE worthy folk who questioned the propriety of this Society performing "The Golden Legend," on the ground of its not being a sacred work, should be consistent, and object to Rossini's "Moses in Egypt," in which Biblical personages sing the lightest of dance melodies, and are mingled with imaginary characters who conduct themselves after the manner of operatic villains and heroines. However, the malcontents must have been in a very small minority, for St. James's Hall was as full on the 8th ult. as it usually is when Sir Arthur Sullivan's popular work is performed. On the whole, the interpretation was satisfactory, the chorus distinguishing itself in the unaccompanied pieces, while Miss Anna Williams, Miss Hope Glenn, and Mr. Lloyd did full justice to their respective parts. Mr. Watkin Mills was prevented by illness from appearing, and Mr. Pierpoint undertook the music of Lucifer, acquitting himself very creditably under the circumstances. Previous to the Cantata, the Dead March from "Saul" and the unaccompanied chorus "Remember not, Lord," from Macfarren's "King David," were performed as a tribute of respect to the memory of the deceased composer.

The usual Christmas performance of "The Messiah" took place on the 22nd ult., and there was a large audience, though the stalls were not fully occupied, perhaps because the cast of soloists was not so strong as it might have been. Mdlle. Antoinette Trebelli, however, showed that she is making herself proficient in the oratorio style, and with regard to Madame Trebelli, Mr. Henry Guy (who appeared in place of Mr. Piercy), and Mr. Burgon, it may be said that they did their best, and gave a fair amount of satisfaction.

NOVELLO'S ORATORIO CONCERTS.

AT the second of these Concerts, which took place in St. James's Hall on the 1st ult., Mr. F. H. Cowen's Worcester Oratorio, "Ruth," was introduced, for the first time, to the notice of London amateurs. The work then passed the test of concert-room performance, and appeared under the circumstances which will ordinarily attend it. At Worcester the case was different. It may be that "Ruth" will never again form part of a cathedral service; wherefore the conditions under which it was given at the Festival of the Three Choirs, and the effects resulting therefrom had not the importance of those connected with the occasion under notice. Hence, also, those who heard it in the one place were anxious to hear it in the other. The result of the concert-room performance seemed to us even more satisfactory than that of the cathedral rendering. As a rule, this cannot be said of oratorio, which usually gains by association with the aspect and influences of a great sacred temple. "Ruth," as our readers well know, belongs to the class of oratorio that does not rest upon a purely religious basis. The religious element in it is not fundamental, but rather imposed upon the story, in which respect it may be classed with Handel's "Esther," "Saul," "Samson"; Mackenzie's "Rose of Sharon," and others easy to recall. Obviously, works of this nature are better adapted to the secular character of a concert-room than, say, "The Messiah" or "Last Judgment," and, we doubt not, the fact will be perceived and acted upon in the case of "Ruth." With regard to Mr. Cowen's music, not much can be said in addition to the critical observations which followed the Worcester performance. But it is important to observe that the good impression then made was confirmed and strengthened by a second hearing. There can be no doubt of the fact that Mr. Cowen has scored a success with his first essay in the high art of oratorio, and shown himself worthy to continue the line of its composers. This appears to us most conclusively proved by the very numbers that, according to some judges, are not up to the desired mark. It has been said that the choruses of "Ruth" fall short of the dignity and grandeur of oratorio. The statement is, in our view, so opposed to fact, that we can only ascribe it to the operation of some pre-conceived opinion, founded upon Mr. Cowen's repute as a writer of light and graceful music, and a sort of instinctive idea that if a man does one thing particularly well, he cannot excel in another. We listened carefully to the "Ruth" choruses in St. James's Hall, and are bound to say that in very large measure they satisfied the requirements, and rose to the standard of oratorio. Moreover, we are unable to agree with those who demand the excision of the numbers in which, after the marriage of Ruth and Boaz, is foretold the blessing which that union will be instrumental in bringing to Israel and the world. Here we have the sole raison d'être of the story as a subject for religious contemplation, and the only argument which can be urged for its treatment in oratorio. It may be that, in the case of some minds, interest ceases with the action of the drama, and no sympathy whatever extends to the greater drama in which the story of Ruth is but an episode. But neither librettist nor composer could take account of this limitation. It was their business to make the work complete, and they acted up to obligation.

The performance was given under Mr. Cowen's direction, and had many distinguished merits. With one exception, the solo vocalists who took part in it were those who sang at Worcester, where the characters were taken by Madame Albani (Ruth), Miss Anna Williams (Orpah), Miss Hope Glenn (Naomi), Mr. E. Lloyd (Boaz), and Mr. Watkin Mills (Elder). The change referred to substituted Miss Agnes Larkcom for Miss Anna Williams, and little affected the general result one way or another, owing to the small share taken by Orpah in the solo work. For the rest, we need not trouble the reader with details. It will be understood that the artists acquitted themselves much as at the Festival performance, and did justice to the thoughts it became their business to interpret. Mention should be made, however, of the special effect with which Madame Albani sang "Entreat me not to leave thee," and "My Father, thou art the guide of my youth"—an effect quite rivalled by Mr. Lloyd in Boaz's song of thanksgiving for an abundant harvest. The orchestra, led as usual by Mr. Carrodus, was in capital form, and the chorus singers greatly distinguished themselves throughout, but above all in the beautiful Finale of the Gleaning scene, where the effect of receding voices was shown in an admirable way. This was far better done than at Worcester. The reception of the work by a large and attentive audience appeared to be very favourable, and we have strong grounds for anticipating that "Ruth" will escape the fate of the many things which are heard once or twice, and then thrown aside to be forgotten.

The third Concert of the season, given on the 15th ult., had a mixed programme, comprising three works very far removed from each other in character. Of these, one—Mendelssohn's Psalm 114—has long ranked among the classics of sacred music, and needs no further discussion. Another—J. F. Barnett's "Ancient Mariner"—represents a type of Cantata in the Mendelssohn school, which was much in vogue twenty years ago; while the third—Stanford's "Irish" Symphony—illustrates the present strong tendency towards the utilisation of national melodic forms for purposes of high class music. The Concert, therefore, had no ordinary interest for intelligent amateurs, many of whom attended it. Professor Stanford's Symphony was taken first of the three, and enjoyed the benefit of a good performance under the composer's direction. So much has been said of late in this and other journals regarding the increased attention paid to national characteristics in music, that we shall not now trouble the reader with renewed discussion of that very interesting topic. But we may express gratification that a leading British musician has given a practical proof of the importance it assumes in his view, and that his national Symphony has so far won a frank and undoubted success. By the way, the two best symphonies of the young English school are both based upon local characteristics. We refer, of course, to the "Scandinavian" of Mr. Cowen and that at present under notice. The fact has a significance not to be overlooked or put aside. Professor Stanford was greatly favoured by the decided character and powerful charm of Irish melody. Indeed, he found the most potent of all musical forces ready to his hand, and he cannot be blamed if, in addition to inventing themes, Irish in form and spirit, he adopted two examples that have long been traditional in his native land. These occur in the Finale, where amateurs delightedly recognise "Remember the glories of Brian the brave" and the grand strains of "Let Erin remember the days of old." The second movement, or Scherzo, is Irish to the core, thanks to the hop-jig tune forming its principal feature; while the slow movement derives its national character from a harp prelude, and the reiteration of a single short phrase known as the "Lament of the sons of Usnach." As for the opening Allegro, the scale largely employed serves, in conjunction with other devices, to make that movement scarcely less national than its companions. Professor Stanford, it is clear from the foregoing, has not carried out his idea in a half-hearted way. The Symphony is distinctly what it pretends to be, and for all its shaping and elaboration according to classic models, cannot be regarded as other than it is. We need scarcely add that it abounds in thematic beauty, or that the composer has worked up his charming materials to excellent purpose, adding to melodic interest that which arises from skilful development and tasteful colouring. We make bold to predict unusual favour for the "Irish" Symphony; encouraged thereto by the enthusiasm it created in St. James's Hall, where all seemed pleased with it.

"The 'Ancient Mariner,'" like the Symphony, had the advantage of its composer's direction, and that work also gave much satisfaction for reasons not less obvious than in the former case. As the Cantata is now twenty years old, and has been frequently performed all the country over, there is little need to enter upon a discussion of its merits, which, moreover, lie frankly on the face of it. Mr. Barnett has treated Coleridge's poem in a manner far from abstruse, being content to write music of a lightly descriptive character, following the changing word-pictures with tone-pictures to match. Very melodious, bright, and pleasing they are, and so the audience unquestionably found them; the greatest pleasure being taken in the performance. The solos were sung by Miss Anna Williams, Madame Patey, Mr. Lloyd, and Mr. Santley, whose names guarantee the excellence of their rendering, while both orchestra and chorus did their work with manifest zest and undoubted distinction. The "Ancient Mariner" should be heard again ere long. Mendelssohn's Psalm, conducted by Mr. Randegger, brought the Concert to a dignified and impressive close.

ROYAL ALBERT HALL CHORAL SOCIETY.

THE only performance by this Society which calls for record in our present issue is that of the "Creation," which took place on the 8th ult. Notwithstanding the potent counter-attraction of "The Golden Legend" at St. James's Hall, there was a large attendance, but it will be well to avoid such unnecessary clashing of interests in the future. This season our three leading oratorio associations are all giving their Concerts on Thursday evenings. The Albert Hall Society's performance of Haydn's perennial work was interesting from the fact that Madame Albani made her first appearance in the Oratorio. How she sang "With verdure clad," "On mighty pens," and her part in the duet with Adam, it would be mere waste of space to describe in detail. Mr. Charles Wade was fairly satisfactory in the tenor music, and Mr. Bridson's voice told well in the bass airs, particularly in "Now Heaven in fullest glory shone."

MONDAY AND SATURDAY POPULAR CONCERTS.

It cannot be denied that Anton Rubinstein is a very disappointing composer. Some of his early works are original and charming, but in almost every department his first effort has been his best. The Sonata in Op. 39, for piano and violoncello, which was introduced for the first time at the Concert of Saturday, November 26, is, for example, decidedly inferior in beauty and symmetry to the earlier work in D (Op. 18), which has become a classic. It has four movements and is planned on a larger scale; but the first and slow movements are laboured and unsatisfactory in outline, though the themes themselves are suggestive enough. On the other hand, the Allegretto, which does duty as a Scherzo, is admirable, and there is a good deal of effective writing in the Final. The pianoforte part throughout is unduly prominent, and Mdlle. Janotha took care to enforce the fact, Signor Piatti's share in the performance being, comparatively speaking, unimportant. The pianist's solo was Chopin's Polonaise in F sharp minor (Op. 44), which she renders with as much poetical feeling as any work in her repertory. Madame Néruda gave the somewhat ruccoco Adagio from Viotti's Violin Concerto in A minor (No. 22), and, like Mdlle. Janotha, was encored. Beethoven's Quartet in F (Op. 18, No. 1), perhaps the finest of the early set, concluded the Concert. Mr. Santley sang Gounod's "The Valley" and Purcell's "Let the dreadful engines," in the way with which the public has become familiar by frequent repetition.

A very quiet programme was presented on the following Monday, and the Concert was chiefly noteworthy for the masterly playing of Miss Agnes Zimmermann in some pieces by Scarlatti. This artist is developing a warmer and more spirited style, and has lost nothing of her purity of touch or neatness in execution. The concerted works on this occasion were Mozart's Quartet in E flat (No. 4) of the set dedicated to Haydn; Grieg's piquant and characteristic Sonata in F (Op. 8), for piano and violin; and Mendelssohn's Trio in C minor (Op. 66). Miss Marguerite Hall rendered Schubert's lovely Lied, "Gretchen am Spinnrade," and two of Kjerulf's Swedish songs with so much grace and refinement as to win the unqualified favour of the audience, and Miss Mary Carmichael was an admirable accompanist.

The scheme on Saturday, the 3rd ult., was much stronger, and St. James's Hall was crowded. Mozart's Quartet in D minor (No. 2) is one of the most popular works of its class, thanks in part to its irresistibly piquant Minuet, which, as usual, was encored. Again, Beethoven's Sonata in F minor, generally known as the "Appassionata," is an immense attraction whoever may play it, and although the reading by Mdlle. Janotha on this occasion was not altogether above criticism, it was sufficiently impressive to arouse the enthusiasm of the audience. The unreasonable demands for an encore were at length complied with, the Polish artist giving Schumann's Novellette in F (No. 1). Included in the programme were Beethoven's Trio in C minor (Op. 1, No. 3) and Mendelssohn's Tema con Variazioni in D (Op. 17), for piano and violoncello.

The Concert of Monday, the 5th ult., may be dismissed with equal brevity. Spohr's Quartet in A minor (Op. 74, No. 1) is one of those in which the first violin assumes the part of a soloist, and it is almost superfluous to say that the work was exquisitely led by Madame Néruda. The only other concerted work was Beethoven's very fine Sonata in C minor (Op. 30, No. 2). Mdlle. Janotha played the first movement of Schumann's Faschingsschwank in her best manner, but the middle sections were taken much too fast, if the tempi adopted by Madame Schumann herself are correct, about which there can be no manner of doubt. The beautiful singing tone which Signor Piatti infused into his rendering of two transcriptions from his own pen of Schubert's songs almost reconciled us to the act itself, though as a matter of principle it should be condemned. Miss Bertha Moore was more acceptable in Taubert's "In a distant land" than in a French song by Goring Thomas.

Grieg's Sonata in F (Op. 8), for piano and violin, and Mozart's Quartet in the same key (No. 8), already heard this season, were repeated on the following Saturday, but they did not constitute the chief attractiveness of the Concert. This honour must be assigned to Beethoven's Serenade Trio in D (Op. 8) and Schumann's Etudes Symphoniques. The former genial work has always been one of the most popular items in the repertory, but Schumann's strangely original composition has only come into favour recently. It was magnificently interpreted by Miss Agnes Zimmermann. Indeed, we may speak of her performance as the best piece of pianoforte playing we have had this season. How Mr. Lloyd sang Beethoven's "Adelaide" and Piatti's "Serenade," the latter encored, it is quite unnecessary to say.

Mendelssohn declared Beethoven's Quartet in F (Op. 59, No. 1) to be one of the most "thoroughly Beethovenish" of all the master's works, but it is less popular with the public than either of its companions, and there was only a small audience on Monday, the 12th. The other concerted items were Haydn's lively Trio in G and Schumann's Sonata in A minor, for piano and violin (Op. 105), which is rapidly gaining in popularity, thanks to the exquisite playing of Madame Néruda. Chopin's Fantasia in F minor is among the least inspired of the Polish composer's efforts, and Mdlle. Janotha did not succeed in making it interesting, though as usual the audience insisted upon an encore.

Every seat had its occupant and late-comers were sent empty away on the following Saturday, for Beethoven's Kreutzer Sonata, for piano and violin, was down for the first time this season. This masterpiece, which Mr. Chappell now reserves for his Saturday subscribers, retains all its attractiveness, though it has been performed more frequently than anything else at the Popular Concerts. On this occasion the executants were Madame Néruda and Mr. Charles Hallé, and the most captious critic could not have desired a better performance. Schubert's Quartet in D minor furnished an additional incentive to attend the Concert. Mr. Hallé played three of Chopin's pieces with so much acceptance that he had to give a fourth by way of encore. Mrs. Henschel's versatility as a vocalist is remarkable. On this occasion she revived Bishop's once popular air "Should he upbraid," and sang it so charmingly that the audience were as much pleased as they are invariably with her more classical selections.

The Concert of Monday, the 10th, was the last of the year. In order to make a good ending Schumann's Quintet in E flat (Op. 44) was included in the programme. This was the earliest work of the gifted though unfortunate composer that gained popularity in this country, and it is now one of those which may always be counted upon to increase the attendance. Except that a perfect understanding did not reign at all times between Mdlle. Janotha and her companions, the performance was very commendable. Beethoven's last Quartet in F (Op. 135), a work only recently understood and appreciated; Chopin's Ballade in A flat, and Spohr's pretty and winning Duet for violin and viola, in E minor (Op. 13), completed the instrumental selections. Miss Liza Lehmann rendered songs by Miss Maude White and Schumann in the charming style which has made her such a favourite at these Concerts.

LONDON SYMPHONY CONCERTS.

Few works have been more talked about recently than Wagner's early Symphony. Mr. Henschel was generally congratulated upon having secured the right of performance in this country, and it was confidently anticipated that the work would prove one of the greatest attractions of the season. The devoted Wagnerians and the Philistines would feel equally curious about it, and St. James's Hall would prove far too small to accommodate all desirous of being present at the initial rendering. Such was the general, and, we may add, reasonable opinion; but the prophets were for once wrong. On the evening of November 29, in place of the expected crowd, there was a beggarly array of empty benches. We shall not waste space in seeking for an explanation of this phenomenon, which, indeed, is almost inexplicable, but pass on to consider the work which was so cavalierly treated alike by the friends and foes of the composer. The somewhat extended history of the Symphony may be compressed into a few lines. Wagner composed it in 1832, when he was nineteen years of age, and greatly under the influence of Beethoven's music. It was first performed at Prague, and shortly afterwards at the Leipzig Gewandhaus Concerts, where it was hailed as betokening great promise. As soon as Mendelssohn was appointed Conductor at Leipzig, Wagner sent him the score in the hope that he would pass an opinion upon it. Mendelssohn did not, however, and Wagner was too proud to ask him. After Mendelssohn's death the score could not be found, and the Symphony was lost to the world, until in 1872 the parts were discovered in a valise left in Dresden when Wagner fled to avoid arrest for his revolutionary opinions. From these parts a fresh score was made, but the work was not heard until December, 1882, when Wagner himself conducted a private performance in honour of his wife's birthday. This was the last time he wielded the bâton, and it is curious that his labours in this department should be closed in connection with a form of art which he professed to consider exhausted. The Symphony shows that, even at nineteen, Wagner had plenty of ambition. It is a work of large proportions, taking nearly three-quarters of an hour in performance. The introduction to the first movement in C major is almost as long as that of Beethoven's No. 7, and like the movement itself is chiefly contrapuntal. Indeed, Wagner speaks of the subjects as being "well-fitted for counterpoint, but very little expressive." The reminiscences of the Bonn master are constant, one from the "Leonora" Overture and another from the C minor Symphony being almost ludicrous. The next section, Andante in A minor, has, however, a genuine melody of an elegiac character for its principal subject, and the details are certainly more interesting. Though rather too long, it is, on the whole, a fine movement, and plainly shows the dawn of genius. The Scherzo in C, again, is particularly bright and animated, and beside bearing a resemblance to Beethoven's Scherzi it also has a passage curiously like the corresponding section of Schubert's great Symphony in C, which, of course, Wagner could not have heard at the time. In the last movement his model would seem to have been the colossal Finale of Mozart's "Jupiter" Symphony. It is a perfect "contrapuntal orgie"—to use his own expression—though of course it will not compare either in masterly device or clearness of expression with the immortal piece which it resembles. Such is a brief sketch of a remarkable work—a work of some interest on its own account and of unique interest as a juvenile effort of one of the most singular geniuses the world has ever seen. The performance was worthy of high praise, Mr. Henschel's players being evidently impressed with a sense of their special duties and striving to render them justice with an amount of zeal which, as a matter of course, attained its end. The rest of the programme on this occasion must be dismissed with formal record. It included Gluck's Overture to "Iphigénie en Aulide," with Wagner's close; Spohr's Dramatic Concerto for Violin, played by Madame Néruda; and Beethoven's "Leonora" Overture, No. 3.

The scheme of Wednesday afternoon, the 7th ult., contained no novelty, and there was a larger audience. Whether the first-named circumstance had anything to do with the other, as some have declared, it would be idle to discuss. We prefer to attribute the increase to the fact that afternoon audiences are attracted by pianoforte music, and on this occasion Mdlle. Janotha was announced to play Chopin's Concerto in F minor. The young pianist was in better form than she had been on many previous occasions this season, and gave a remarkably delicate and poetical rendering of the slow movement. The Symphony was Beethoven's in F (No. 8), the interpretation of which was spirited but somewhat coarse. The accent was exaggerated and the balance of tone sometimes incorrect. Mr. Henschel's players were heard to great advantage in Greig's lovely melody for strings, "Spring," which was repeated by desire, and in Dvorák's Slavic Dance in A flat. The programme was completed by Mendelssohn's "Ruy Blas" Overture and Berlioz's Réverie for contralto, "Le Captive," the latter being expressively rendered by Miss Lena Little.

The aspect of the hall at the fifth Concert, on Tuesday evening, the 13th ult., was decidedly encouraging, the reserved portions being fuller than on any previous occasion. The programme consisted entirely of modern music, thus affording some support for the damaging assertion sometimes made that the older masters are no longer attractive to the public. Without further evidence, however, we refuse to believe a statement which would imply a sad condition of popular taste. The central feature of the scheme was Schumann's Symphony in C, a work now generally regarded as its composer's finest effort of the kind. It was, on the whole, well played, the Finale receiving the greatest amount of justice; but the fiery Scherzo has often been heard to greater advantage at the Crystal Palace and the Philharmonic Concerts, Mr. Henschel's first violins being of second-rate quality. The Charfreitags music from "Parsifal" served to show how much the most acceptable portions of Wagner's music-dramas lose when transplanted to the Concert-room. In order that he might sing the part of Gurnemanz, Mr. Henschel resigned the bâton to Mr. Barnby, and Mr. O. Niemann, a son of the great German artist, Albert Niemann, appeared as Parsifal. The new-comer was heard to much greater advantage, however, in Lieder by Schubert and Schumann. Brahms's Tragic Overture commenced the Concert, and a pretentious, but somewhat vulgar, Slavic March, by Tchaikowsky, brought it to a conclusion. Some violoncello solos, played by Signor Piatti, formed one of the most enjoyable features of the evening.

The public has made up its mind not to take any interest in Wagner's Symphony. Of that there can no longer be any doubt, for at the repetition performance, on the afternoon of the 21st, there was again a very scanty attendance, the shilling parts alone being well occupied. The value of the puff preliminary, in a matter of this kind, is therefore proved to be exactly nil, and the moral should be taken to heart by those whom it most concerns. A second hearing of the work confirms what was felt before—namely, that it is far too long for the value of the material employed. This remark applies chiefly to the first two movements; the third and fourth are more compact and symmetrical. A very great impression was made by Mr. Bernhard Stavenhagen in Liszt's Concerto in E flat and Bach's Chromatic Fantasia and Fugue. That works, so opposite in character, should be equally well played proves the versatility of the young artist whose purity of execution and physical power were equally noticeable. The public is so eager to hear first rate pianoforte playing that Mr. Stavenhagen might, with advantage, give some Recitals during his stay in London. Weber's "Der Freischütz" and Brahms's Academic Overtures completed the programme.

THE BACH CHOIR.

THIS institution renders good service to art by putting forward such programmes as that of its first Concert this season, which took place at the Prince's Hall on the 20th ult., at the unusual hour of five o'clock in the afternoon. In the feverish activity of musical work at the present day, and with the constant demand for novelties of all kinds, we are liable to forget the treasures of a past age. Un-accompanied part music is in especial danger of neglect, though it is in this very branch of composition that our own country can best lay claim to equality with the musical nations of the Continent. The Bach Choir programme did not fully enforce this fact, and at other times our glorious composers of the madrigalian age and their modern imitators might be more strongly represented. The examples of English music on the present occasion were the elder Wesley's fine Motett "Omnia Vanitas," Gibbons's Madrigal "Ah! dere heart," and two of Pearsall's best Part-songs. The most important item in the scheme was Palestrina's "Stabat Mater," for eight solo voices and double choir. This composition exhibits in the strongest light the old master's wonderful skill in producing variety of effect with the limited means at his disposal. Some of the passages are intensely expressive, and one cannot but acknowledge, in listening to such a work, Palestrina's right to be termed the father of modern ecclesiastical music. Associated with this masterpiece were a curious setting of the Magnificat by Gabrieli, two effective Psalms by Sweelinck, a piquant Christmas Carol by Prætorius, and pieces by Brahms, performed on previous occasions by the Bach Choir. The singing was fairly good, though the balance of parts was unequal. Dr. Villiers Stanford should take steps to strengthen the tenor department. In order to afford some variety, Miss Emily Shinner played Tartini's Violin Sonata in G with excellent technique, and joined the composer in Dr. Hubert Parry's Partita in D minor, a capital imitation of the Suites of Bach and his contemporaries.

CRYSTAL PALACE.

A SPARSE audience assembled on the 3rd ult., when Señor Alberto Geloso made his first appearance at the Crystal Palace Concerts. Señor Geloso is a refined player but wanting in the animation, not to say passion, demanded by the opening Allegro of Mendelssohn's Concerto. Altogether there was a lack of verve about his rendering which was not compensated for by his generally very pure intonation and the delicacy with which he gave the slow movement. His pianissimos were real pp. Rietz's Clarinet Concerto is one of those agreeable compositions which involve no intellectual effort on the part of the hearer. It is very melodious, though the melodies are devoid of individuality, and full justice was done to the solo part by Mr. Clinton both in regard to tone and execution. Mdlle. Trebelli contributed Verdi's "Caro nome" with finished execution and considerable vocal charm, but was less successful in Haydn's "With verdure clad." The director of these Concerts, reverting to a habit of former seasons, had on this occasion introduced some madrigals into the programme. These were well sung by the Crystal Palace Choir, but a lack of balance is observable, the altos and basses being far too weak. The Concert, which opened with Haydn's Symphony in E flat, concluded with a performance of the Overture to "Dinorah."

Mr. Bernard Stavenhagen, who appeared at the tenth Saturday Concert, has undoubtedly improved since his last visit, and bids fair to take a very high rank among contemporary pianists. He has a wonderful technique, and displays the most remarkable gradations of light and shade in his playing. With such endowments it will be strange if he does not rise higher. His rendering of Beethoven's Concerto in C minor—recently played at these Concerts by little Hofmann—was in all respects masterly. Later on he played, for the first time at Sydenham, Liszt's brilliant Hungarian Rhapsody (No. 13), and received a well merited encore for the triumphant ease with which he surmounted its many difficulties. Another novelty at these Concerts was "Träume"—Wagner's study for orchestra to "Tristan und Isolde," recently introduced to English hearers by Mr. Henschel. Mr. Santley sang Purcell's "Let the dreadful engines," and a tuneful and appropriate song, entitled "Christmas comes but once a year," by Ralph Betterton. The Symphony was Beethoven's (No. 7), in A, a regular cheval de bataille of Mr. Manns's, and the programme also included Bach's Concerto for strings in G, and a ballet air from Goldmark's "Königin von Saba." Of the performance of Cowen's Oratorio "Ruth," on the 17th ult., with a cast identical in all respects save one with that which performed it in St. James's Hall, nothing need be said to help to increase its popularity, for here, as elsewhere, it was most favourably received, alike for its own merits as for the excellent way in which it was given. The choir of the Novello Oratorio Concerts, bringing knowledge and experience of the work, sang the choruses most effectively. Miss Anna Williams undertook the soprano music, and sang with the efficiency and conscientiousness for which her name is a guarantee.

THE MUSICAL ASSOCIATION.

AT the meeting, on the 5th ult., Mr. J. F. Rowbotham lectured on "The Differences between Ancient and Modern Art." Premising that by ancient art he would chiefly understand Greek art, and by ancient music Greek music, Mr. Rowbotham went on to observe that modern art and music stood to that of the past in the relation of contradiction rather than of development. In the plastic arts the ancient aim was Idealism, the modern, on the contrary, Realism. In music a counter tendency was manifested, and we strove to enhance the ideal possibilities of the art, while the Greeks confined it to a realistic adherence to nature. In many points the Greeks were our superiors—in the simplicity of the means by which they attained musical beauty, in the chastity of their musical thought, and in the fidelity with which they copied the very utterances of natural expression, their songs and melodies being but slightly exalted reflections of the tones of ordinary speech. Mr. Rowbotham instanced the chastity and simplicity of Greek architecture as an emphatic parallel to the character of Greek music, and maintained that the architecture and the music alike were matured and completed creations of the Greek mind, which was accustomed to set restraints on fancy, and delighted in rigorous self-control. As compared with such a parallel, we might see in modern music the unrestrained and often wanton licence of Gothic architecture, where, if resources were more ample and effects more varied, taste was more unsteady, and far more frequently fell into error. In contrasting minuter points of difference between Greek music and our own, Mr. Rowbotham stated that with the Greeks the melody of music was always in the bass, while with us, popularly speaking, it lies in the treble. He entered into an elaborate description of the effect of this strange inversion of functions on the art at large. Another striking difference lay in the fact that in Greek music the main interest of composer and listener alike was centred on the play of the rhythm—the melody being reduced to a subordinate and inconsiderable thing, as often as not, perhaps, left to the spontaneous fancy of the singer, and in all cases little esteemed and valued. Rhythm attained with the Greeks so elaborate a development that there were over a hundred different sorts of time, and these in various combinations might give many hundreds of varieties of rhythmic phrases. It was not at all uncommon for a Greek composer to employ in the first twenty bars of his piece twenty various kinds of time—each bar being different in measure from its neighbour. By contrast with this plethora of rhythmic life, our music is monotonous in the extreme. Many times have dropped out of use since the days of the Greeks which were of the utmost value for the incisive expression of sound; and the lecturer specially instanced 5-4 time and 7-4 time as measures which were of everyday employment in Greek music, but now have been practically lost to the art. In allusion to Greek melody, Mr. Rowbotham argued that it was as bare and poor as our rhythm. The Greek modes, he said, were simply tunes, or rather the materials of tunes so arranged with certain expressive gradations that the composer could, without any trouble, turn them into fairly expressive melody. This exactly suited the Greek standpoint of musical art, which set scarcely any store on melody, but employed all its strength and interest on rhythm. "The Greek composer," said Mr. Rowbotham, "before commencing to write, set as a superscription what melody the piece should be in, and with this as a background set to work to weave and traffic with the time; while we superscribe the time, and with the time as our background begin to create and elaborate the melody." Numerous other differences were adduced by the lecturer, who stated, en passant, a curious piece of information, that the Greeks were acquainted with the Fugue form and the Sonata form, which are not things of yesterday, but were employed as the basis of the great choral odes, sung under the shadow of the Athenian Acropolis more than two thousand years ago. The lecture was followed by an animated discussion, in which Mr. Rowbotham's estimate of the value of Greek music was keenly disputed.

MACFARREN SCHOLARSHIP.

A MEETING was held on the 6th ult., at the Royal Society of Musicians, 12, Lisle Street, W., with Dr. E. J. Hopkins in the chair, when an executive Committee was appointed and a large number of promises were announced. Local sub-committees are in progress of formation in all the large towns, and when they are fully organised will doubtless promote the success of the fund to a very considerable extent. At present the subscriptions amount to more than £900, but much more than this will be requisite in order to provide maintenance for the scholar, and it will doubtless be forthcoming. The first List of Subscriptions will be forwarded to anyone who will apply to Mr. J. Percy Baker, the acting honorary secretary, Willersley House, Wellington Road, Old Charlton, S.E.

GUILDHALL SCHOOL OF MUSIC.

AMONG the many advantages enjoyed by this prosperous institution must be numbered the use of our noble Guildhall for its Choral and Orchestral Concerts. It is stated that the Corporation is about to erect a large organ in the building, and with this addition it will form the finest concert-room in the metropolis. The performance on Saturday afternoon, the 3rd ult., was one that could only be carried out by a music school numbering its pupils by the thousand. The students' orchestra consisted of 123 players, and to these were added a choir of nearly 200. From a strictly municipal point of view, the interest of the occasion centred in the performance of a new civic anthem, the words and music of which had been written by Mr. Weist Hill. Based on the lines of our National Anthem, and consisting of a brief baritone solo and chorus, the piece is admirably adapted to its purpose, though its value as a work of art may be slight. It evidently pleased the Lord Mayor (Alderman de Keyser), who attended in state, for he requested an encore, and it was played for the third time as he retired at the close of the Concert. The programme generally was evidently designed to show that the school is doing good work in three departments of musical education—namely, composition, singing, and orchestral playing. In the first-named branch we had an extremely well written Prelude and Fugue by Mr. R. Strickland, a piquant Minuet by Miss Edith Swepstone, and an expressive setting of the hymn "Saviour, again," by Miss Kate Davenport. The most promising of the young vocalists who appeared were Miss Caroline Norman, a light soprano; Miss Annie Swinfen, a soprano of a more robust type, and Miss Annie Morley, who has a genuine contralto voice. Capital performances were given of the Overture to "William Tell," and the first movement of Brahms's Symphony in D (No. 2), the precision of the huge mass of strings being especially noticeable. Mr. Weist Hill, the Conductor and Principal of the Guildhall School, may be congratulated on the entire success of the Concert.

"ST. JOHN THE BAPTIST."

THE death of Sir George Macfarren occurred at a time when our leading choral societies had completed their arrangements for the season, or we should have had to record more in memoriam performances. As it is, however, the west and the east of the metropolis have already paid tributes of respect to the deceased musician, by preparing and performing his first and best Oratorio, "St. John the Baptist." Mr. W. G. McNaught and his admirably trained Bow and Bromley Institute Choir were first in the field, and the rendering took place on the 6th ult., in presence of a full audience. Even if judgment had not long ago been passed on the work, this is not the moment for critical discussion of its merits, and we have, therefore, only to speak of the performance, which, on the whole, was worthy of the occasion. If the choir did not sing with quite its usual precision, it must be remembered that the time for preparation had been very brief, and it speaks much for the efficiency of the force that the slips were so few. The soloists were Miss Annie Marriott, Miss Hilda Wilson, Mr. Henry Piercy, and Mr. Bantock Pierpoint. The first three sang in their customary artistic manner, and Mr. Pierpoint made a strong impression in the titular part, singing with power and true expression.

It was fitting that the Royal Academy of Music should give a public manifestation of respect for the memory of its honoured Principal at the earliest possible opportunity, and this occurred at the usual Christmas Orchestral and Choral Concert, which was fixed for Saturday, the 17th ult. As already stated, the tribute took the form of a performance of "St. John the Baptist"; but the Oratorio was preceded by the Obsequial March from the composer's "Ajax," which was also played at the funeral service in Westminster Abbey. This the audience received standing, and late comers were excluded until it had ended. It was reasonable to anticipate a worthy rendering of the principal work of the evening at the hands of so able a Conductor as Mr. Barnby, but we confess to having been surprised at the degree of merit actually attained. According to the programme, the choir was most unevenly balanced, the sopranos and contraltos numbering 116, and the tenors and basses only seventeen voices. The latter were reinforced, however, from some source unstated, and the choral numbers were admirably given, precision and excellent attack being combined with perfect attention to the nuances. The solos were, of course, allotted to students of the Academy, the narration being divided between Miss Hannah Jones and Miss Greta Williams, while Mr. David Hughes took the principal part, Mr. Faithful Pearce that of Herod, and Miss Lilly Crabtree that of Salome. All the young vocalists proved themselves competent, Miss Crabtree and Mr. Hughes showing special promise.

OBITUARY.

AT Vienna, on the 9th ult., there died, at the age of sixty-seven, the Hungarian violinist Miska Hauser, who as a boy of twelve made the tour of the world, which for a time won him International fame. He was particularly fêted in America and Australia, and several of his songs are still in vogue. He retired into private life some twenty years ago, and was practically forgotten.

HENRI PANOFKA, the celebrated German violinist and composer, died at Carlsruhe, on the 5th ult., in his eightieth year. Born at Breslau in 1807, he was destined for the Bar, but from his earliest years he was taught singing and the use of the violin. At ten years of age he became a musical prodigy, and, having consequently studied under Mayseder and Hoffman, in 1827 he gave a series of Concerts at Vienna, Munich, and Berlin. Proceeding to Paris, he became associated with Berlioz. In 1844 he came to London under the auspices of Mr. Lumley, and practically directed the operations of the operatic troupe collected by that entrepreneur. Among its members were Frascini, Lablache, Coletti, and Jenny Lind. Panofka remained in London until the year 1852, when he returned definitively to Paris. He became attached to the staff of several musical journals, notably the Messenger and the Temps, and was the Paris correspondent of the new Musical Gazette of Leipzig, founded by Schumann. He was very successful in the tutorial art, and in 1858 he published a work entitled "The Art of Singing," in which he gave a résumé of his labours. This work has since been very useful to professors in Germany, France, and England. Panofka was the author of a number of Fantasias, of an Elegy, a Caprice, &c., and a number of Studies for the violin entitled "Reveries." In 1858 there appeared eighty-eight of his pieces as a vocal "Abecedaire," and a number of his religious pieces were also published under the title of "Hours of Devotion."

WE record with regret the death of a contralto singer who, a few years ago, occupied an important place among rising artists. Mrs. R. Lewis Verity, better known as Miss Bertha Griffiths, passed away on the 5th ult., after a long and weary illness, at Elm Lodge, Cheltenham, the residence of her father, the Rev. Henry Griffiths, at the early age of thirty-seven. The deceased lady was a pupil of Signor Randegger. In 1872 she made her début at the Colston Hall, Bristol. In 1874 she sang at the Gloucester Festival, under Dr. Wesley—her first appearance at a meeting of the Three Choirs. Subsequently she sang three years consecutively at these gatherings—at Hereford, in 1876, under Mr. Townshend Smith; at Gloucester, in 1877, under Mr. C. H. Lloyd; and at Worcester, in 1878, under Mr. Done. But her reputation was by no means confined to these centres. She filled numerous engagements in Oratorio and miscellaneous Concerts in London and elsewhere, and attained considerable popularity. In 1880 she married Mr. R. Lewis Verity, and retired from the profession. She leaves three children to share with her husband their irreparable loss.

MR. GEORGE I. VENABLES, who was well known in connection with the Tonic Sol-fa system, and who, with his brother Mr. Leonard C. Venable, founded the South London Institute of Music, died on the 23rd ult., at his residence at Camberwell, from an attack of congestion of the lungs. The deceased gentleman was only in his forty-third year.

MUSIC IN BIRMINGHAM.

(FROM OUR OWN CORRESPONDENT.)

APART from musical events special to the festive season, most of which fall too late for detailed notice in this letter, the month of December has not been marked by any performance of conspicuous excellence or importance. Some little commotion has been caused in musical circles by the successful crusade against Sunday Concerts, initiated here by the Lord's Day Observance Society; but it is an ill wind which blows nobody good, and though the closing of the Concert Hall at Aston Lower Grounds on Sunday evenings will deprive the band and singers of a welcome addition to their earnings, and the music-loving public of an opportunity which was keenly and extensively appreciated, it will bring a golden harvest to the tills of the publicans and beerhouse keepers, who found their most formidable Sunday competitor in the Aston Orchestral and Vocal Concerts.

When things come to the worst they are proverbially apt to take a turn for the better, and it is quite in harmony with this experience that instrumental chamber music, which was lately in extremis here, should once more be in the ascendant. Season after season, for many years back, this refined and intellectual variety of the art has spelt nothing but vexation and loss to the musicians who have touched it, and when Dr. Heap last season, following the example of Mr. Stratton and so many other predecessors, finally decided to abandon the costly and thankless task of educating public taste in this direction, no other local musician could be induced to fill the void. At the eleventh hour, however, the Birmingham Musical Guild, which has been formed in the interests of art as well as of the profession, announced that they had determined to give Chamber Music yet another trial on popular lines. The public response at first was not very cordial or encouraging, but a mixed committee of amateur and professional musicians having been formed to carry out the scheme, an excellent subscription list was soon obtained, and the first Concert, which took place on November 29, drew a large and appreciative audience. The programme, which had but one fault—that of being too long—comprised Mozart's String Quartet in C, that of Rheinberger for piano and strings, in E flat (Op. 38), portions of Sterndale Bennett's Sonata in A (Op. 32), for pianoforte and violoncello, and of Beethoven's String Trio in E flat (Op. 3), Bach's Partita in B flat and Chopin's Impromptu (Op. 66) for pianoforte, Franz Ries's Violin Suite (No. 3, Op. 34), and songs by Schubert and Bennett. Mrs. Hale was the pianist, Madame Oscar Pollack the vocalist, and the string quartet was furnished by Messrs. F. Ward, E. W. Priestley, T. R. Abbott, and J. Owen; Mr. Troman acting as accompanist to the songs. The instrumental pieces had evidently been well rehearsed, and were quite within the powers of the several performers. Mrs. Hale delighted her hearers by her clear and unaffected reading of the Bach Partita, and the spirit and executive skill which she displayed in the Chopin Fantasia. Madame Pollack was in excellent voice, and fairly carried away the audience by her intensity and dramatic feeling in Schubert's fine song "My resting place." Mr. Ward's brilliant rendering of the Violin Suite by Ries excited great enthusiasm, and the same artist's leading in the Quartets was distinguished by judgment and technical skill.

As example is contagious and success kindles emulation, it was only natural that the public-spirited and highly promising attempt of the Musical Guild to obtain a hearing once more for Instrumental Chamber Music in Birmingham should lead others to do likewise. On the 9th ult. Madame Agnes Miller gave the first of a short series of Chamber Concerts, presenting one or two elements of novelty, and the reception accorded to the entertainment was as gratifying and encouraging in its way as that previously extended to the Guild series. The distinctive feature of Madame Miller's Concert was that the performers were, from the bénéficiaire downwards, all of the fair sex; the string quartet consisting of Miss Emily Shinner and Miss Lucy Riley (violins), Miss Cecilia Gates (viola), and Miss Florence Hemmings (violoncello). The programme comprised Beethoven's String Quartet in C minor (No. 4, Op. 18), Schumann's E flat Quintet (Op. 44), two movements from Mendelssohn's G minor Concerto, for violin (Op. 6), Weber's Pianoforte Sonata in the same key (Op. 70), and three of Scarlatti's so-called Studies. Madame Miller's playing of the Weber Sonata was characterised by remarkable vigour and spirit, and in the Scarlatti Studies—really embryo Sonatas—she acquitted herself with great taste and skill. The violin playing of Miss Shinner created great enthusiasm; the lady possesses executive powers of a high order, as was shown more particularly by her bravura playing in the Mendelssohn Finale, and she phrases like a true musician.

Messrs. Harrison's second Concert, on the 1st ult., was in point of attendance and enthusiasm even a greater success than the first; but its interest was rather artistic and personal than musical. First and foremost among the performers came Madame Adelina Patti, looking like Thais, "ever young and ever fair," and with her were associated in the vocal department Miss Georgina Ganz, Madame Antoinette Sterling, Mr. Orlando Harley, and Signor Foli. In the instrumental department, honours were divided between Miss Marianne Bissler (solo violin), and Signor Tito Mattei (pianoforte), the former of whom played with taste, refinement, and considerable executive skill Paganini's "Moto perpetuo," Sarasate's "Zigeunerweisen," and a melody of Schumann. Madame Patti, who was in excellent voice, raised the enthusiasm of her audience to a high pitch by her singing of the Shadow song from "Dinorah," and on the redemand of the effort she volunteered Schubert's Serenade, with a violin obbligato contributed by Miss Eissler. Madame Patti's subsequent performances were of a more popular order, including Mattei's song "A kiss and good-bye," "The last rose of Summer," and, on compliance with encores of those songs, "Comin' thro' the rye" and "Home, sweet home." Madame Antoinette Sterling's fine voice and style were displayed to advantage in Cowen's song "The reaper and the flowers" and Mackenzie's new Scotch ballad "A dear wifey," which latter was encored. Mr. Harley won a recall after his singing of "Quando le sere," from "Luisa Miller," and Signor Foli was, as usual, highly effective both in his old favourite, "In sheltered vale," and Stanford's version of the droll Irish ballad "Father O'Flynn."

Operatic ventures have not been very successful in Birmingham of late. Even the Carl Rosa Company have been unable to make their recent visits pay, and the attempt to galvanise Italian Opera into life has for several years past been a conspicuous failure. Nevertheless, Mr. Mapleson's Italian Opera Company paid another visit here in the early part of the month, and gave three performances on successive evenings at the Theatre Royal. The selection comprised "Don Giovanni," which was performed in honour of the centenary; "Faust," and "Il Flauto magico."

On the 19th ult. an interesting Concert, under the conductorship of Mr. Stockley, was given at the Midland Institute, by the members of the Madrigal Society, assisted by Miss Dora Bright (pianist) and Mr. George Brewerton (solo vocalist). Among the most successful items of the evening were the compositions of two local musicians—Mr. Gaul's melodious part-song "Daybreak" and Dr. Wareing's "Gather ye rosebuds." Miss Bright was not heard to such advantage in Liszt's "Rhapsodie Hongroise" (No. 2) as in Mendelssohn's Lieder. Mr. Brewerton especially charmed the audience by his singing of Balfe's "The arrow and the song."

The customary Christmas performance of "The Messiah," by the members of the Festival Choral Society, was given on the evening of the 26th ult., with Madame Clara Samuelli, Miss Eleanor Rees, Mr. Henry Piercy, and Mr. Watkin Mills as principal vocalists; Mr. Astley Langston as Organist, and Mr. Stockley conducting. Its success, both musically and financially, was a foregone conclusion.

MUSIC IN EDINBURGH.

(FROM OUR OWN CORRESPONDENT.)

As the usual Choral Union Concerts have been given up, there are this season more opportunities for local artists to come forward. Messrs. Townsend, Della Torre, Colin McKenzie, and Grant McNeill announced six classical chamber Concerts, the first of which they gave, very successfully, on November 28, in the Freemasons' Hall. Mozart's Trio in E flat (Op. 14); Schumann's in D minor (Op. 63); Beethoven's Sonata, for piano and cello (Op. 5, No. 2), performed by Mr. Della Torre (piano) and Mr. Grant McNeill (cello); a violin solo (Handel's Sonata in A) by Mr. Colin McKenzie, and Mendelssohn's Duo, Allegro Brillante, played by Messrs. Townsend and Della Torre, constituted the programme.

On the same evening Mr. Carl Rosa's Opera Company gave a brilliant performance of "Carmen." During the week of their stay here, "Mignon," "Masaniello," "Nor-disa," "The Bohemian Girl," and two performances of "Don Giovanni" were given. Mesdames Marie Roze, Georgina Burns, Blanche Cole, Miss Fanny Moody, and Messrs. Runcio, Leslie Crotty, Max Eugene, and Aynsley Cook were the principal artists of the company. Mr. Goossens conducted.

Sir Herbert Oakeley played the following selection at his Organ Recital, in the Music Class-room, on the 8th ult., which was, as usual, attended by a crowd of attentive students and their friends:—Advent and Christmas music—the Recitative ("Behold! a Virgin"), Air and Chorus ("O thou that teltest"), with the Pastoral Symphony, from "The Messiah"; besides pieces by Bach, Mozart, Kalkbrenner, Beethoven, Spohr, Gluck, and Sir F. A. Gore-Ouseley.

On the 9th ult. Handel's "Samson" was performed by Mr. Kirkhope's choir, accompanied by a small string orchestra, led by Mr. Daly. It was repeated on the afternoon following, and the proceeds given for the benefit of a local charity.

On the evening of the 12th the second classical chamber Concert was given, consisting of Haydn's Trio in E flat, in which Mr. Della Torre took the piano, Mr. McKenzie, violin, and Mr. Grant McNeill, cello; Grieg's Sonata for piano and violin (Op. 8), Gade's Trio in F (Op. 42), and Chopin's E flat Rondo, brilliantly rendered by Mr. Della Torre.

Mr. Carl Armbruster gave a Lecture to the members of the Philosophical Institution on the 14th ult. His subject was "Modern Composers of Classical Song." In illustration, Miss Pauline Cramer sang, among others, Liszt's "Lorelei," Franz's "When the spring," and Rubinstein's "Forest Witch."

Herr Alfred Gallrein (violoncellist) gave, on the 14th ult., a Chamber Concert, in which he was assisted by Miss Nellie McGregor (first violin), Mr. Winram (second violin), Mr. Holder (viola). The concerted pieces were selected from the old masters, and the solos from the modern. Mr. Gallrein gave a fine rendering of the Dotzner-Wagner "Tannhäuser Fantasia," a Lied by Hofmann, and others. Miss Charters (soprano) sang A. C. Mackenzie's "In our boat" and two of Schubert's songs, and Mr. H. Seligmann (tenor) contributed three lyric songs, which he sang in appropriate style.

A meeting of the Edinburgh Society of Musicians was held on the evening of the 17th ult., at which Herr Otto Schweizer gave a Lecture on "The National Songs and Dances of Europe." In illustration of his descriptions, various members played and sang, each (as far as possible) according to his nationality. Mr. Edmunds (the President) sang "Twas merry in the hall," Messrs. Lichtenstein and Rothfeld played Hungarian dances (Brahms), Mr. Sveinbjörnsson sang Scandinavian songs, Messrs. Peterson and Dace played a tarantelle and fandango, Messrs. Peterson and Schweizer Norwegian dances, Mr. Millar Craig represented Scotland by singing "Mary of Castlecary," and Mr. Waddel gave a reel and a strathspey on the violin: Switzerland was illustrated by the lecturer, who sang a Swiss "jodel," and Italy by Mr. Arthur Edmunds, who sang a charming canzonetta. A letter was read from Dr. A. C. Mackenzie, thanking the Society for electing him a member, and expressing a hope to be present with them next spring.

Messrs. Paterson and Sons have announced four Concerts, for which they have engaged Mr. Manns and his orchestra. The first was given on the 19th ult., in the Music Hall. The programme contained Mendelssohn's "Midsummer Night's Dream" Overture, Beethoven's Symphony (No. 5, C minor), the "William Tell" Overture, and Delibes's "Sylvia." Miss Elly Warnots sang "Jours de mon enfance," from Hérold's "Le Pré aux clercs," a valse from Gounod's "Mireille," and "Non paventer," from Mozart's "Magic Flute." The programme, although containing nothing very new or striking, was enjoyable; and it is to be hoped that these Concerts, so few in number, will be well supported.

MUSIC IN GLASGOW AND THE WEST OF SCOTLAND.

(FROM OUR OWN CORRESPONDENT.)

THE first Subscription night of the series of Choral and Orchestral Concerts under the direction of the Glasgow Choral Union was on the 13th ult., and, in spite of fears to the contrary, there was a large attendance on the part of subscribers and the general musical public. Though the subscriptions are fewer than before, it is still expected, at least earnestly hoped, that the general financial result will not be much less satisfactory than before. The programme of the first Concert comprised Cherubini's Overture to "Anacreon" and Beethoven's Symphony (No. 5) in C minor, not to mention some less important numbers. The band proved to be excellent in all the departments, and under the experienced baton of Mr. Manns everything went as satisfactorily as could be desired. Mr. Fernandez Arbos, the leading violin in the orchestra, postponed his announced appearance at this Concert in the solo part of Mendelssohn's Violin Concerto, from having somewhat injured his hand, and Mr. Elderhorst, the vice-leader, played instead the Ballade and Polonaise of Vieuxtemps, and with a very fair measure of success. Miss Elly Warnots contributed three solos of a character suited to her peculiar gift of vocalisation.

The opening Popular Concert of the series—namely, on Saturday evening, the 17th ult.—was very largely attended. Schubert's Unfinished B minor Symphony, and the Overtures, "A Midsummer Night's Dream" and "William Tell," were the prominent features of the programme, which in general was of the character of that of the previous Tuesday Concert. Miss Warnots was again the vocalist. Mr. Gillet, the leading violoncello in the orchestra, played several solos; Mr. Joseph Bradley, the new choral conductor, accompanying in one of them—"Vito," a Spanish dance, by Popper.

A performance of "Elijah" was given by the Choral Union on the 20th ult., and was conducted by Mr. Bradley, with general satisfaction.

The first Concert by the Bridgeton Choral Society was given under promising auspices, in the City Hall, on the evening of the 1st ult. Mr. J. Barnby's Cantata "Rebekah" formed the chief part of the programme, and received as fair a measure of justice, chorally, as could be expected at the hands of a choir so recently formed. Mr. Taggart was Conductor. There was an excellent band, Mr. W. H. Cole leading, and the soloists were equal to their work. The Cantata, which had not been heard for some time, appeared to command hearty acceptance.

The second of a series of four Chamber Concerts, by Mr. W. H. Cole and party, took place on the 8th ult., in St. Andrew's (Berkeley) Hall, and it is gratifying to relate that, in spite of the inclemency of the evening, there was a large audience. Schubert's Octet for strings, clarinet, bassoon, and horn was played, for the first time, it is believed, in Scotland. Beethoven's Quartet (Op. 95) in F minor was another important item in an altogether excellent programme.

A Concert of sacred music was given by the choir of Camphill United Presbyterian Church, on the 16th ult. The programme was formed of selections from Handel's "Messiah" and Mendelssohn's "Elijah," and was illustrative first of "The Birth, Suffering, Death and Resurrection of our Saviour," and, second, "The Preaching of the Gospel by St. Paul." The idea of connection and sequence is somewhat novel; but, as it seems to me, is not unworthy of being followed up. Mr. W. Schofield, the able Organist of the Church, conducted, and Mr. Thomas Berry accompanied on the organ. Good taste and effect marked the entire interpretation. The minister of the congregation presided.

The second of a set of four Subscription Concerts took place in the G. A. Clark Town Hall of Paisley, on the 16th ult. It consisted chiefly of orchestral music, performed by the band of the Glasgow Choral Union, under the bâton of Mr. Manns.

A performance of W. Hume's Cantata "Blind Bartimeus," together with excerpts from Handel's "Samson," &c., was given by the choir of Anderston Free Church, on the evening of the 16th ult. The choristers numbered about sixty voices, and under the guidance of Mr. James Mitchell, leader of the Psalmody, acquitted themselves well. The solos for baritone, soprano, and alto occurring in the Cantata were well rendered by members of the choir. Mrs. Shepherd and Messrs. Howell and Macdonald contributed solos from Gounod and others.

At the monthly dinner of the Glasgow Society of Musicians, on the 10th ult., the post-prandial musical programme consisted of compositions by members. These comprised pianoforte solos, violin and violoncello solos, and songs. It was a first experiment, and from its great success is likely to become a pretty frequent feature. A paper was read at a previous meeting on Musical Examinations, and considerable discussion followed.

A performance of Mendelssohn's Oratorio "Elijah" took place on the second night of the Choral Union series of Concerts—namely, on the 20th ult. Mr. Joseph Bradley was the Conductor. Hitherto Mr. Manns has conducted the Choral and Orchestral Concerts alike, but Mr. Bradley having given remarkable satisfaction at the practisings, it was decided to place the principal performance under his care. The result on that occasion, it is gratifying to say, thoroughly justified the confidence reposed in him as a commander of a large vocal and orchestral force. The performance was, indeed, altogether one of unusual excellence. The chorus sang with dramatic life and precision, yet with sufficient attention to phrasing and expression, and in some respects they have not made so good an appearance for some years back. The principal vocalists were Madame Nordica, Miss Hope Glenn, Mr. H. Beaumont, and Mr. Watkin Mills. There was a large attendance.

The Dundee Amateur Choral Union gave their first Concert for the season in the Kinnaird Hall, on the 21st ult., the work performed being "Judas Maccabæus." The solo vocalists were Madame Nordica, Miss Hope Glenn, Mr. Iver McKay, and Mr. Robert Grice. The accompaniment was by the band of the Glasgow Choral Union, led by Senor Arbos, with Mr. Harrison, Edinburgh, as Organist. Mr. Carl D. Hamilton, the recently appointed Conductor of the Society, made his first public appearance in that capacity.

The Philharmonic Society of Kilmarnock gave a Concert on the 20th ult., at which was produced—the first occasion of its performance—a Cantata, "Jerusalem," the music written by Mr. W. H. Dixon and the text compiled by the Rev. R. Riach Thorn. There was a chorus of 100 voices, an efficient quartet of solo vocalists, and an orchestra, so that on the whole justice was done to the new composition, which, generally speaking, is of a most commendable character. It was warmly received.

The Langside Free Church Musical Association performed L. N. Parker's Cantata "Silvia," with some shorter pieces, on the 21st ult. Mr. J. L. Mackay conducted. The Lenzie Musical Association gave a performance of Handel's "Messiah" on the same date, Mr. J. Turnbull conducting.

The Hillhead Musical Association gave their first Concert of the season on the 21st ult., Lloyd's "Hero and Leander" and Gade's "Spring's Message" being the principal selections in the programme. Mr. W. T. Hoeck conducted.

Stirling is hardly in the district intended to be represented under the heading of my column, but still I may mention the important fact that the first performance, on this side of the border, of Mr. F. H. Cowen's new Oratorio "Ruth" was given in that historical town on the 21st ult., by the Stirling Choral Union, under Dr. Allum. The performance was altogether one of very considerable merit, assisted, as the Society was, by Mrs. Hutchinson, Mr. Bantock Pierpont, and other competent artists, and having the aid also of a good orchestra. The extremely melodious, picturesque, and graceful music afforded delight to a large audience.

MUSIC IN LIVERPOOL.

(FROM OUR OWN CORRESPONDENT.)

THE third of Mr. Charles Hallé's series of Concerts was given in the Philharmonic Hall on Tuesday, November 29. The principal interest naturally was centred in Schubert's colossal Symphony (No. 9) in C, the rendering of which was just about as faultless as the work itself. In the massive grandeur of the Andante (first movement), the charming melody with which the Andante con moto (second movement) is impregnated, the rich harmonic effects of the Scherzo and Trio, in the restless yet always rhythmical force and energy of the Finale, Allegro vivace, including the marvellous culmination thereof; in all of these qualities the magnificent body of players never flagged or wearied a moment, and thereby presented a perfect tone-picture to a delighted audience. Mr. Hallé was himself the solo instrumentalist, and was heard to great advantage on this occasion. Mr. Santley, as the vocalist of the evening, appeared here for the first time this season, and charmed his auditors by his voice of evergreen freshness and perfect style. Mr. Risegari took Mr. Hallé's place on the rostrum during the performance of the Beethoven Concerto, in the absence, through indisposition, of the leader, Mr. Straus.

On Saturday afternoon, the 3rd ult., Mr. H. Steudner-Welsing gave a Pianoforte Recital in the small Concert Room of St. George's Hall, illustrative of "The

TUNES FROM "THE HYMNARY"

BY

J. POWELL METCALFE.

Price Fourpence.

PREFACE.

There is an ever-increasing conviction that decency and order are better promoted by the singing than the saying of the Offertory Sentences—and that not only in our larger, but in our smaller churches as well. In the latter the adoption of the desired use is to a great extent prevented by the anthem character of the music employed in the usual offertory setting.

The following arrangements are more especially intended for the use of those choirs who, not being regularly trained in anthem-singing, are accustomed to rely on the tunefulness, form, and compactness of the hymn-tune for aid in fittingly rendering the words they sing.

Fantasia," as exemplified by Bach, Mozart, Beethoven, Schubert, Mendelssohn, Schumann, and Chopin. The works selected were by the above-named composers in order, and were as follow:—1, Fantasia and Fugue in G minor; 2, Fantasia in C minor; 3, Fantasia-Sonata (Op. 81), "Les Adieux," "L'Absence," "Le Retour"; 4, Fantasia in C major (Op. 15); 5, Fantasia in F sharp minor; 6, Fantasia in C major (Op. 17), "Ruins," "Triumphal Arch," "Starry Sky"; 7, Fantasia in F minor. Mr. Steudner-Welsing went through the above programme, and by no means trifling ordeal, in a highly creditable manner, the Bach, Beethoven, and Chopin excerpts deserving special mention. There was a large and critical audience, who applauded Mr. Welsing most heartily.

The fifth of the Philharmonic Society's Subscription Concerts took place on the evening of the 6th ult., before an exceptionally large audience, the pièce de résistance on this occasion being Cowen's new Symphony (No. 5) in F, which is still in manuscript, and was performed here for the first time on this occasion. Delicacy and refinement pervade the whole work, and it was received with the utmost enthusiasm, though the rendering was not all that could be desired. Madame Albani, too seldom heard in Liverpool, was the vocalist. She contributed "Caro nome" ("Rigoletto"), Verdi; "Vago lo sguardo" ("La Vita per lo Czar"), Glinka; and Handel's ever-welcome air, "Let the bright Seraphim." In the last-named item the trumpet obbligato was magnificently played by Mr. Jaeger, who fairly shared the honour of a recall with the cantatrice. The orchestra played the Overtures to "Prometheus" (Beethoven) and "Gustave, ou le Bal Masqué" (Auber), as well as an Air and a Gavotte from Suite in D (Bach). The choristers sang, with good effect, Mendelssohn's setting of the 114th Psalm, "When Israel out of Egypt came," Processional March from Gounod's "La Reine de Saba," and the Evening Song of the Maidens, "Come away, with willing feet," from Sullivan's "Martyr of Antioch." Mr. Hallé conducted.

Mr. Charles Hallé's fourth Concert, on the 13th ult., served to introduce to Liverpool a new pianist of wonderful ability in the person of Mr. Stavenhagen. This gentleman, who is but a youth, may, by his admirable technique and brilliant execution, together with rare delicacy of touch and true interpretation, justly be classed among the very best performers of the day. Besides joining the orchestra in Liszt's Concerto in E flat, which abounds in difficulties, he played Schumann's "Papillons" and Liszt's "Rhapsodie Hongroise" (No. 12), after which he was several times recalled, and finally, amidst enthusiasm such as is rarely shown here, gave as an encore a posthumous Valse by Chopin. It is hoped on all sides that Mr. Stavenhagen will soon return to Liverpool and give a Recital. The orchestra played, in splendid style, Mozart's tuneful and melodious Symphony in D major, the Overtures to "La Vestale," by Spontini, and "Mirella," by Gounod, as well as a truly characteristic Suite in E (Op. 39), by Dvorák. Miss Emily Winant was the vocalist, and Mr. Hallé conducted.

The sixth of the Philharmonic Society's Concerts, which took place on Tuesday, the 20th ult., consisted, as is annually the custom, of a performance of "The Messiah." Nothing new can be said of the familiar, time-honoured, and well-worn numbers making up Handel's famous work, which has become to Christian England almost as dear as the Bible itself. The performance this Christmas was meritorious throughout, the choristers singing better than they hitherto have done this season, the leads being each and all attacked with the utmost vigour. The principal vocalists need but to be enumerated to show that their portions in the rendering of the work were excellent. They were Mesdames Anna Williams and Patey, and Messrs. Edward Lloyd and Bridson. The band was occasionally very faulty. Mr. Best was at the organ, and Mr. Hallé conducted.

We are to have a seven weeks' spell of English Opera at the Court Theatre here, commencing on the 9th inst., by the Carl Rosa Troupe. The personnel of the Company practically remains the same, though the répertoire is somewhat enlarged, and embraces this year Meyerbeer's "Robert the Devil," Auber's "Masaniello," Massé's "Galatea," together with Mozart's "Don Giovanni" and "The Marriage of Figaro." There has already been a very good sale of subscription tickets, and a first-class season, artistically and financially, is confidently expected.

(FROM OUR OWN CORRESPONDENT.)

At the second of Mr. Hallé's six choral Concerts, on the 1st ult., "Elijah" was given, with Mr. Santley as the Prophet, and with Miss Anna Williams, Miss Hilda Wilson, and Mr. Iver McKay as the other principals, assisted by Misses Moorhouse, Bertenshaw, and Tervin, and Messrs. N. Dumville and J. Barrow in the double quartets. The two succeeding Concerts were especially enjoyable. Madame Néruda gave, on the 8th ult., Spohr's Concerto Dramatique and three of the Hungarian dances of Brahms and Joachim, with the purity of tone and the refined expressiveness which we ever look for from her; and Mrs. Henschel made her second appearance, and fully justified her quick return by the cleverness with which she atoned for a voice certainly not strong, and the finisse with which she shaded off the more delicate parts of the songs she undertook. In Beethoven's Symphony in F (No. 8) the band confirmed the general feeling that it is, in every respect, better than in any former season. In wealth of tone, in vigour of attack, and in due subordination of each individual player to the general effect, Mr. Hallé's orchestra has this winter decidedly advanced its reputation. The second appearance of Herr Stavenhagen (on the 15th) attracted a large and most enthusiastic audience. He played No. 12 of the "Rhapsodies," and, as an encore, a portion of another, and the "Grand Concerto," in E flat. No more favourable opportunity of forming a reliable judgment of such works is likely to be offered to us.

For Mr. Hallé's two Christmas performances of "The Messiah," the Misses Anna Williams and Hilda Wilson, with Messrs. Lloyd and Santley are promised; while Mr. de Jong announces the Misses Mary Davies, Annie Albu, Hope Glenn, and Eleanor Rees, with Messrs. Seymour Jackson, Sidney Tower, Foli, and Barrington Foote; and the assistance of Mr. James Lowe at the organ.

I am pleased to be able to congratulate also Mr. de Jong upon the greatly enhanced excellence of his orchestra. It may be that a healthy emulative spirit is animating conductors this season, or that able instrumentalists are becoming more numerous and accessible; but, unquestionably, our Thursday evening Symphonies and Suites, and our Saturday evening Overtures and Selections are being rendered with increased brilliance and spirit. In "Egmont" and "William Tell," in "Semiramide" and in "Das Nachtlager in Granada," the band has been tested and approved; while those musical hashes called "Selections" have served to please those who delight in catchy tunes and euphonium solos. One agreeable feature in Mr. de Jong's programmes has been the introduction of small concerted pieces for some of his excellent wood-wind. At the Free Trade Hall, as well as at the Concert Hall, a young local tenor—Mr. Alfred Jordan—has won friendly applause and genial encouragement.

The Gentlemen's Concerts, since I last wrote, have included one orchestral performance (at which Mdle. Janotha played with immense vigour, and the Gade Symphony in B flat was well given), a programme of Chamber Music, and one or two of Mr. Hallé's afternoon Recitals.

Beside a week of Italian opera under the direction of Mr. Mapleson, during which the singing—or the voice—of Signor Ravelli attracted much attention, we have had, at the Town Hall, two visits of French organists of distinction. M. Jules Grison was unknown here, and, perhaps, misunderstood the taste of English amateurs; but his programmes were monotonously simple in character—a "Meditation" being followed by an "Elevation," and that, again, by a "Communion," or something of equally unexciting nature. But a week later M. Guilmant renewed the interest which his annual visits always arouse, and by his better planned selections and his masterly performance gave the utmost pleasure to crowded audiences.

On Friday, the 2nd ult., the Mayor of Manchester, Alderman J. J. Harwood, granted the use of his parlour and presided over a meeting at which he distributed the certificates granted here by the National Society of Professional Musicians. Evidently the examinations of the Association have taken firm root, for upwards of 300 certificates were awarded, a very large proportion in "honours," and a most excellent programme of instrumental and vocal music was given by the professional and advanced graduates.

MUSIC IN OXFORD.

THE October Term that has just closed has not been marked by extraordinary musical activity, at least so far as local societies are concerned. A number of well known performers have visited Oxford, but it is scarcely necessary to do more than chronicle the fact. Josef Hofmann played to a crowded audience on November 15 in the Town Hall, and produced, of course, a deep impression. On the 2nd ult., Mr. Charles Hallé and Madame Norman-Néruda paid their annual visit to Oxford and gave a Recital in the same room. Both the societies that devote their attention to Chamber Music have given performances of a more or less public character this Term, and both performances took place in Christ Church Hall. At the Concert of the Musical Club on November 8, the performers were students from the Royal College of Music. At the Invitation Concert of the Musical Union the Heckmann Quartet played. Neither Concert needs much notice here; from students promise rather than performance is expected, though a local newspaper was rather too severe in describing them as "fairly efficient for amateurs."

The College Musical Societies have done next to nothing. Merton College alone has given a Concert, which took place on the 2nd ult., in the College Hall. It was studiously unpretentious, but fully succeeded in its modest aim of affording a pleasant evening.

Mr. Farmer gave a Concert in Balliol College Hall on November 26, for which he engaged the services of Miss Mary Davies and of a number of Lay Clerks from the Collegiate Choirs. Interest was added to the programme by its being converted into a sort of Unionist demonstration through the selection of national ballads, and the numbers of the audience made it probable that a handsome profit was realised.

On the 1st ult. a performance of Spohr's "Last Judgment" was given in the Cathedral. The ordinary choir was largely reinforced by good amateurs, and the chorus amounted to nearly 100. An almost uniformly satisfactory rendering was obtained, and a deep impression seemed to be produced on the crowded congregation.

A Concert was given on Friday, the 16th ult., in the Large Lecture Room of the Wesley Memorial Chapel, by the choir and friends, when A. R. Gaul's "Holy City" formed the first part of the programme. Mrs. Arthur Harris, Miss Ada B. Green, Mr. J. Wright, and Mr. H. Sunman, of Christ Church Cathedral, were the soloists. Mr. Edgar Mills presided at the piano, and Mr. R. J. Grubb at the harmonium. Mr. A. F. Kerry, B.A., of Exeter College, conducted. The second part of the programme consisted of songs and part-songs, and was much appreciated.

The University Glee and Madrigal Society gave a Concert in the Sheldonian Theatre on November 29. The programme was of the usual kind and was rendered with the excellence that we have been taught to expect from this Society. Perhaps the most effective piece of chorus singing was Leslie's "Thine eyes so bright," in which a certain want of balance between the parts that was sometimes noticeable was less felt. Amongst the soloists, Miss Anna Fremantle and the Rev. H. E. Clayton carried off the honours; the former deserves a special word of commendation for singing the conclusion of Bach's "Mein gläubiges Herz" as the composer wrote it.

MUSIC IN SOUTH WALES.

(FROM OUR OWN CORRESPONDENT.)

ON November 29 a bazaar was held in aid of a fund to defray the cost of an organ chamber and an organ at the Wesley Chapel, Broadway, Cardiff. Messrs. Hallett and Son, Cardiff, have already built the chamber, and Messrs.

Vowles and Co., Bristol, are building the instrument. The total cost of the whole work will be about £800. Major Evan Rowland Jones, United States Consul for Wales, opened the bazaar. On the same evening Mrs. Roskell, Penarth, gave an admirable Concert at the Park Hall, Cardiff, at which there was a large and fashionable attendance. Miss Alice Gomes, who sang in place of another lady, was recalled several times; Miss Hilda Wilson and Mr. Sidney Tower also sang with effect. Several instrumental selections were performed, two organ solos being given by the Organist, Mr. Aylward, the other artists being Mr. A. Hudson, violin; Mr. F. Lambert, violoncello; and Mrs. Roskell, pianoforte. Mr. S. G. Fifoot and a section of the Cardiff Orchestral Society, of which he is the Conductor, also took part in the programme.

An Organ Recital was given at Newport, on November 25, by Mr. Alfred Eyre, Crystal Palace. Miss Marie Gane, Bristol, and other vocalists assisted. A high class Concert, one of a series, was held at St. Fagan's on the same evening. Lady Windsor rendered a Welsh song, and among those present was her father, the Hon. Sir Augustus Paget, and a number of influential residents in the locality.

In Merthyr, Aberdare, Cardiff, and other parts of South Wales, Mrs. Warwick Gray's Children's Opera Company, from the Crystal Palace, have given sacred Concerts at which fairly large audiences have attended.

On the 5th ult., at the Oddfellows' Hall, Dowlais, a Concert was given by the Battalion Band 2nd G.R.V., Mr. E. B. O'Neill conducting. Solos were rendered by Miss Marian Price a pleasing vocalist; Miss R. James, Pontypridd; Mr. W. T. Davies, Talgarth; and Mr. J. Sandbrook. Mr. Noakes sang eight or nine comic songs.

The police bands in South Wales are making progress. The annual Concert in aid of the local Police Band Fund was held at the Albert Hall, Swansea, on the evening of the 15th ult., and was remarkably well attended. The band gave several exhibitions of their skill under the conductorship of Mr. Lingwood. Instrumental solos were rendered by several officers, and excellent vocal assistance was given by Madame de Lido, Miss Lucy Clarke, and Mr. Frank May. At the end of November the Cardiff police band also gave a Concert to a crowded audience at the Park Hall, under the leadership of Mr. Paul Draper. Their power was accelerated by the addition of the Penarth Artillery Band. Eos Morlais and Miss Clarke were the vocalists engaged.

Mr. F. Atkins, M.B., has issued a spirited appeal in favour of a local effort being made to support the founding, in connection with the Royal Academy, of a Musical Scholarship in memory of the late Sir George Macfarren.

A complimentary Concert was given at the Park Hall, Cardiff, to Mr. Harry Moreton, on the 9th ult., in recognition of the many services he has rendered in connection with local charitable and other movements. Among those who took part in the programme were Mr. and Mrs. Frost and Madame Gertrude Lewis, Mr. Joseph E. Deacon acting as accompanist.

The performance, at the Temperance Hall, Merthyr, of "Joseph and his Brethren" was very successful. The parts of Joseph and Pharaoh were taken respectively by Mr. Benjamin Jones and Mr. W. R. Price. Mr. B. Davies discharged the secretarial duties in connection with the undertaking.

Among miscellaneous matters may be mentioned a Concert at Llandaff by the Dean's Students, and a Smoking Concert at Cardiff in connection with the Rifle Volunteers. A Musical Festival took place at Trevecca, on the 14th ult. The object was to cultivate congregational singing. Mr. D. Jenkins, M.B., was the Conductor.

MUSIC IN THE WEST.

LAST month's campaign was opened in Bristol by the first public Concert given by the new Society of Bristol Gleemen. This took place at Victoria Rooms on the 1st ult. We quote from their own account of themselves: "Male-voice glee-singing has for many years been popular as a form of musical education in Bristol, and the Societies which have fostered its growth have deservedly met with cordial approval and encouragement. It is with a desire to further accommodate a large number, whose tastes led them to favour this branch of vocal music, that the Society of Bristol Gleemen was founded in January, 1886, and the experience of the meetings which have been regularly held since that date has more than justified the expectations." It may be mentioned also that during this first year of the Society's existence over sixty members have joined it, unconnected with the other similar societies in the city, and this is a most hopeful sign of the steady advance of this branch of musical culture. The choir consists of seventy-four voices, and Mr. Walter Kidner is the Conductor. We cannot append the whole of the programme, but the selection was a judicious one, from the works of Abt, Becker, Rillé, Kücken, Reichardt, Lindpaintner, Witt, Rousselle, Dürner, &c., not forgetting a well-written glee by our talented citizen, Mr. Joseph Roedel, entitled "Twilight." The balance of parts in the choir was good, and there was a heartiness about the efforts of the members which was pleasant to notice, and which augured well for the future of the Society. In criticising their performance, we wish to remember that it was their first Concert, and that, consequently, the smoothness and equality which come from long practice and experience could not be looked for. The Concert, as a whole, was highly successful, and reflects the greatest credit both on the Society and on the Conductor. We may perhaps be allowed to suggest that the granting of encores on these occasions, at least, is a mistake. The melancholy result of so doing is that the voices get tired and the pitch falls, thereby destroying all pleasure to the listeners. The hymn "O Sanctissima" was quite spoilt by being so much out of tune, and we feel sure that weariness was the cause of this. There was a large and appreciative audience present, and Bristolians will now look forward with pleasure to another annual musical institution—namely, the Ladies' Night of the Society of Bristol Gleemen.

The announcement that Madame Patti was to sing on the 5th ult. filled Colston Hall in every part with a most enthusiastic crowd, who vehemently encored all three songs given by the great prima donna, the latter kindly responding on each occasion. A brilliant company supported Madame Patti, consisting of Madame Antoinette Sterling, Miss Ganz, and Miss Eissler (violin), Mr. Orlando Harley, Signor Foli, Signor Tito Mattei (pianoforte), and Mr. Wilhelm Ganz, who conducted. Miss Eissler was new to Bristol, and created a most favourable impression by her spirited and artistic playing, making us hope that we may ere long have the pleasure of hearing her again. It is needless to comment upon the performances of the other musicians, whose names guarantee success.

The Dramatic Recital by Mr. Charles Fry of scenes from Shakespeare, with choral music by such an excellent choir as that of the Cheltenham Festival Society, under the direction of Mr. J. A. Matthews, naturally brought together a good audience at the Handel Hall, on the 8th ult. Mr. Fry's reading, most earnest, intelligent, and impressive throughout, was especially so in the scenes from "Othello" and the "Merchant of Venice," and kept the audience interested from first to last. The whole of the recitations were given so effectively as to gain enthusiastic applause and two recalls. The music included "Autolycus' Song" (Macirone), from the "Winter's Tale"; "It was a lover and his lass" (Barnby), from "As you Like It"; "Hark, the lark" (Cooke), from "Cymbeline"; "When daisies pied" (Macfarren), from "Love's Labour Lost"; and "The cloud-capt towers" (Stevens), from "The Tempest," all of which were most efficiently rendered, the two first-named being especially well sung.

An interesting programme was presented at Mrs. Viner Pomeroy's second Concert for the present season, on the 7th ult., a special feature being Bach's Concerto in C minor, for two pianofortes, with quartet accompaniment. Mrs. Roedel kindly assisted Mrs. Pomeroy on this occasion, and played with her well known musicianly skill and taste. The last movement went with great spirit, and the Concerto was much enjoyed. The audience, which was larger than usual, tried to obtain an encore after Mr. Henry Holmes's delightful rendering of two violin solos, Barcarole (Spohr) and Ballade (Alfred Holmes), but were not gratified, which, no doubt, was a wise decision, the programme being just the right length without any repetition. Mozart's Quartet for strings, in D minor, was well rendered by Messrs. Holmes, Woodward, Ellis Roberts, and Pomeroy, though occasionally there was a little unsteadiness observable. Mrs. Pomeroy contributed two Studies—a Nocturne and an Impromptu from the works of Chopin; and last, but certainly not least, came Schumann's beautiful Quintet in E flat, for pianoforte, two violins, viola, and violoncello, which received a very admirable rendering, and brought the evening to a close. The next Concert will take place on February 8. There have been other Concerts, of which the programmes do not call for detailed notice, during the past month, such as that given by the Bristol Post Office Band on the 2nd ult.; that in aid of the Orphans of Elementary Teachers on the 14th ult., when several pieces were sung by a choir of 1,000 children; and that given by the Saturday Musical Association on the 17th ult., when a good miscellaneous programme was performed before a very large audience. Mr. Dodd still continues his Monday Concerts, but the attendance as a rule is very small, and we understand that the venture is not a success, financially considered. Organ Recitals were given by Mr. George Riseley on the 1st and 3rd ult.

A performance of Spohr's "Last Judgment" was given at St. Mary's, Redcliffe, on the 15th ult., with augmented choir, under the direction of Mr. Lawson, the Organist of the Church.

An excellent Concert was given at the Assembly Rooms, Cheltenham, on November 30, with the "Shinner" Quartet, the performers being Miss Emily Shinner, first violin; Miss Lucy Stone, second violin; Miss Cecilia Gates, viola; Miss Florence Hemmings, violoncello; Miss Olga Nérua, pianoforte, with Mr. Herbert Thorndike as vocalist. The programme included Schubert's Quartet in A minor, for strings, and Beethoven's Trio in D major, for piano, violin, and violoncello, besides some well-played violin and violoncello solos, and three songs, admirably sung by Mr. Thorndike.

The Cheltenham Quartet Society gave a private Subscription Concert, on the 14th ult., of a really high-class type. Performers—Herr Josef Ludwig, first violin; Mr. G. Collins, second violin; Mr. Richard Blagrove, viola; Mr. E. Whitehouse, violoncello; Mr. A. von Holst, pianoforte. Beethoven's Quartet in D major (Op. 18), Haydn's Quartet in B flat major (Op. 75), and Brahms's Quartet in E flat, for piano, violin, viola, and cello, were all excellently rendered, and gave the greatest enjoyment to those present. The next Concert is announced for February 12.

A grand Orchestral and Ballad Concert was given at the Hamilton Hall, Salisbury, on the 5th ult., by Mr. Augustus Aylward and the Cathedral Quartet, and was in every way a great success. Miss Mary Davies was the principal vocalist, and the Cathedral Quartet (Messrs. Pitman, Howgate, Crick, and Kelsey) sang part-songs, glees, and solos very satisfactorily. Miss Davies was encored in all her songs, and the orchestra (the best that has been heard in Salisbury for years) was paid a similar compliment, and repeated Suppé's Overture "Banditen streiche" and Gounod's "Funeral March of a Marionette." The other orchestral pieces were Mendelssohn's "Wedding March," Beethoven's Symphony, No. 1, in C, and the Overture to "Masaniello." Mr. Howgate, the principal tenor of the Cathedral, gained an encore for his solo, and also for the duet with Miss Davies, "Maying" (A. M. Smith). The orchestra, numbering about forty performers, was led by Mr. Frank Bartlett (the principal local violinist), and Mr. Augustus Aylward accompanied and conducted throughout. The hall was crowded.

The Sarum Choral Society gave their second Concert of the season at the Assembly Rooms, Salisbury, on the 9th ult., when Gade's "Zion" and Brahms's "Song of Destiny" were performed, the vocalist being Mr. Musgrove Tufnail. There was a full band and chorus; Mr. C. Gamblin was the leader, and Mr. C. F. South conducted. The programme included the Scherzo from Schumann's Symphony in E flat, and Haydn's Symphony in E minor, besides part-songs, and two songs by Mr. Musgrove Tufnail, "Versailles" (Cobb), and "The Lads in Red" (Molloy), which were both encored.

Great interest centred on the production of Sullivan's Cantata "The Golden Legend," by the Plymouth Vocal Association, which took place at the Guildhall, Plymouth, on the 14th ult., under the able conductorship of Mr. F. N. Löhr. The band and chorus numbered 300, and the principals were Madame Lilian Nordica (soprano), Miss Mary Crouch (contralto), Mr. Iver McKay (tenor), Mr. Vaughan Edwardes (bass), Miss Audain (harp), Mr. Pardew (first violin), Mr. Faull (Hon. Organist). Madame Nordica was most successful as Elsie, and Miss Crouch did good work as Ursula, while the part of Prince Henry suited Mr. McKay's voice to perfection, and Mr. Edwardes sang with spirit the music allotted to Lucifer. Mr. Löhr has every reason to be proud of the work of his chorus, who gave a most satisfactory account of themselves throughout, and did not flinch from the ordeal of the unaccompanied chorals. The band performed their difficult task well, and accompanied with judgment and skill. Mr. Pardew and Mr. Faull both rendered valuable aid, and in every way the performance may be termed a success. A short miscellaneous selection preceded the Cantata, in which was included, by special desire, a "Slumber Song," the composition of Mr. F. N. Löhr, which was sung with excellent attention to light and shade, and evoked hearty applause. The next Concert will be given in April next, when Berlioz's "Faust" will be performed.

The Organ Recitals at the Victoria Hall have been discontinued until February, the hall being required for other purposes.

A very attractive programme was presented by Mr. Liebich at his first Chamber Concert, given at the Victoria Rooms, Clifton, on the 20th ult., including Raff's Trio in G, Goetz's Trio (Op. 1), and Mendelssohn's Trio in D minor, all for piano, violin, and violoncello. Mr. Liebich ably sustained the pianoforte part, and was powerfully supported by Mr. Carodus (violin) and Mr. Leo Stern (violoncello). The two last-named gentlemen delighted the audience with a solo on their respective instruments. Miss Thudichum was the vocalist, and Miss Romola Tynte considerably increased the pleasure of the evening by a couple of very clever recitations.

The Exeter Orchestral Society gave their last Subscription Concert for the year on the 3rd ult. The programme included Schubert's Marche Militaire, arranged for orchestra by the Conductor; Nicolai's Overture to the "Merry Wives of Windsor" (very well rendered, a bassoon solo by Winterbottom, very cleverly played by Mr. J. Bayman, of Plymouth; Overture to "Maritana," and several other light pieces. The vocalist was Mr. Walter Jekyll, who sang Schubert's "Erl König" and Rossini's "Largo et factotum."

A farewell benefit Concert was given on the 13th ult., by Miss Bessie Furze, a local mezzo-soprano, who is leaving Exeter to continue her studies in London.

Mr. D. J. Wood, Organist of the Cathedral, has been presented by a few friends with a handsome silver-mounted bâton of appropriate design, as a "Souvenir of the Jubilee Festival in Exeter Cathedral, 1887."

On the 12th ult., the Bath Philharmonic Society began their present season with a brilliant Concert, in which Madame Albani played an important part. The announcement of her advent filled the room with an eager crowd, who welcomed her most rapturously and encored her so persistently that on one occasion she was obliged to return to the orchestra three times in acknowledgment. Her singing of the soprano solo in Mendelssohn's "Hear my Prayer" was as near perfection as possible, and in her solos she excelled herself, more especially in the Valse from Gounod's "Romeo and Juliet." The great choral work of the evening was Rossini's "Messe Solennelle," very carefully performed by the band and chorus under the direction of Mr. Visetti, Mr. von Praag leading. The work was new to Bath and created a very favourable impression. The solos were well placed in the hands of Miss May Hallam, Miss Annie Morley, Mr. Herbert Clinch, and Mr. Albert Reakes. The chorus showed a good knowledge of the music, and deserve credit for their earnest efforts and zealous attention to their Conductor's beat.

On the following evening, the Bath Quartet Society gave their first Concert, for this, their 32nd season, before a more numerous assembly than usual. The Concert opened with Schubert's Quartet in D minor and closed with Haydn's Quartet, No. 49. The performers were Herr Josef Ludwig, Mr. Collins, Mr. Richard Blagrove, and Mr. Whitehouse. Miss Lucy King was the pianist, and was most successfully associated with Mr. Whitehouse in Mendelssohn's Sonata in D major, for piano and cello.

MUSIC IN YORKSHIRE.

DURING the month the Heckmann Quartet party have paid visits to three Yorkshire towns—Halifax, on the 12th ult., in connection with Mr. J. H. Sykes's Subscription Concert; Huddersfield, for the Subscription Concert of the 13th ult.; and Leeds, where they took part in Mr. J. R. Ford's fourth Concert, on the 14th ult. On each occasion they were accompanied by Dr. Villiers Stanford, who appeared in the double capacity of composer and pianist. At all three performances Dr. Stanford's Quintet in D minor was an item of more than ordinary interest, and its production added to the reputation of the Cambridge professor. The general level of the composition is dignified, and often too severe for the ordinary hearer, the Adagio and Finale particularly so; but the effect is telling. The themes are seldom calculated to attract the popular ear, but what is lost in this respect is amply compensated for by a compact, well-knit design, elaborate and scholarly part writing, and effective climaxes. At Halifax the physical surroundings were not altogether favourable to the performance, and the Quintet was received with something like indifference; but at Leeds Dr. Stanford was called before the audience with a warmth and vigour which showed that his composition had made a strong impression. The Cologne Quartet excel in ensemble playing, and their absolute precision, strikingly exemplified in most difficult movements, their magnificent phrasing, and their sympathetic playing justly entitle them to the popularity which they have gained. Among the works which they performed at the three Concerts were Beethoven's Quartet in A major (Op. 18), Schubert's Quartet in D minor, and the same composer's Quartet in G. The executants also gave solos, the leader, Herr Heckmann, especially distinguishing himself at Leeds in a Réverie by Vieuxtemps. At Halifax and Huddersfield choral music was added to the programme, the performers being the Huddersfield Prize Glee and Madrigal Society. The Society rendered with rare finish and beauty of tone several well-known glees, two of them being by Callcott and Pinotti; but their most important effort was the rendering of Dr. Stanford's setting of a hymn by Klopstock, "Awake, my heart," the parts being for baritone voices and organ.

The Bradford Subscription Concert of the 11th ult. was made up chiefly of Chamber Music, to hear which an audience filling St. George's Hall and numbering close upon three thousand people assembled. The programme was rich and rare, put together with that exquisite discrimination and taste which Mr. Hallé so happily combines with his practical ability; and it was carried out by artists who for ability and conscientiousness could not be surpassed. The gem of the setting was undoubtedly Schubert's Octet in F, of which a brilliant rendering was given by the executants—Madame Norman-Néruda, Signor Risegari, Herr Straus, Signor Piatti, Mr. J. Hoffmann, Mr. G. A. Hoffmann, Herr Paersch, and Mons. Lalande. But there were several important compositions, among others the Rondo alla Zingaresca, from Brahms's Quartet in G minor, which captivated the audience generally as much by its melody and characteristic style as it did musicians in particular by its peculiar rhythm. Of solo music there were several equally enjoyable examples. There was, for instance, one of Signor Piatti's solos, without which no Concert which he attends would be complete, the selection in this instance being an arrangement of his own. Then Madame Néruda gave Beethoven's Romanza in G, an old favourite, which she plays with the perfection of fine feeling; and finally Mr. Hallé's contribution, which included Chopin's Second Ballade, a Gavotte by Brahms, and one of Gluck's short pieces. The vocalist was Mdle. Trebelli, who made her second appearance before a Bradford audience with unqualified success. The accompaniments to Mdle. Trebelli's songs were excellently played by Mr. S. Midgley.

The Leeds Festival Committee have commissioned Dr. Cresser to write a work for the next Festival. The announcement will give the greatest possible satisfaction to local musicians in a double sense—first, because of the encouragement shown to local talent; and second, on account of the wisdom of the choice. The Organist of the Leeds Parish Church has a good reputation, and as a composer he has undoubtedly distinguished himself among local musicians of the creative order by his several works, and especially by the composition of a Mass recently produced with much success.

Several enterprising local musicians have again been busy in the sphere of Chamber Music. In this category the Concert given by Mr. S. Midgley, of Bradford, during October, should not be overlooked. The programme was exquisitely chosen, and it was equally carried out with good taste and musicianly skill. Mr. Midgley was assisted by Herr Straus in one of the finest possible renderings of the Kreutzer Sonata, the performance of the Finale being especially happy. The executants were scarcely less successful in the rendering of Dvůrák's characteristic Sonata in F, and Brahms's serious piece of German classicism in A (Op. 100), which latter proved, however, a severe morsel for the audience. Herr Straus played a selection from Spohr's Sixth Concerto, and Mr. Midgley gave a thoughtful rendering of the Sonata Pathétique. An undoubtedly fine feature of the Concert was the singing of Madame Henrietta Tomlinson and Miss Marianne Tomlinson.

Mr. Edgar Haddock's series of Musical Evenings progresses satisfactorily. There was a fairly large audience at the Philosophical Hall, Leeds, on November 28, when, among other works produced, was the Brahms's Sonata in A major. The production of the work was an important step in advance, and its selection was justified, at least, by the thoughtful rendering which it received at the hands of Mr. Haddock and Mlle. Louise de Nohac, though it may well be doubted whether the audience were sufficiently alive to its real merits. Mr. Haddock assisted Mr. Charles Heinrich at a Concert given by the latter, on the 19th ult., in the Bradford Church Institute. The pianist played one of Chopin's Ballades and one of Liszt's best transcriptions of Wagnerian music. Mr. Haddock's solos were greatly enjoyed, and the singing of Miss Marie Lammert was a decidedly acceptable feature of the Concert.

Herr Christensen gave another Matinée, on the 10th ult., at the Leeds Conservatoire, with the assistance of Herr Eckener (violin), Herr Giessing (cello), Mr. Kershaw (violin), Mr. Nesbitt (viola), and Miss Jessie Beevers (vocalist). The principal instrumental works were Beethoven's Quartet in C and Prout's Quartet in F, which latter was received with great favour.

Madame Patti sang to a large audience in the Leeds Coliseum, on November 26, at a Concert promoted by Messrs. Hopkinson. She was accompanied by Miss Georgina Ganz, who made a fairly successful appearance, and by Madame Antoinette Sterling, Mr. Orlando Harley, and Signor Foli. Signor Tito Mattei was the pianist, and Miss Marianne Eissler gave a magnificent rendering of Schumann's "Traumerei" and one of Sarasate's compositions. Herr Wilhelm Ganz took part with Miss Eissler in the rendering of Sonatas by Dussek and Grieg.

The annual performances of "The Messiah," by the Philharmonic Society in Leeds and the Festival Choral Society in Bradford, proved as successful as heretofore, though there was a somewhat meagre attendance at the Bradford production.

MUSIC IN AMERICA.

New York, December 12, 1887.

THE last month has been crowded with interesting occurrences in Opera-house and Concert-room. Young Josef Hofmann is the reigning sensation in the latter, and stands conspicuously before the chroniclers of musical events not only because of the extraordinary success which attends his Concerts, but also because he is the only one of our visitors from Europe thus far who has been successful. The catastrophe which I intimated last month as likely to overtake the Tua enterprise has come. A few days ago the handsome violin player's manager, wearied of his losses, and taking advantage of a clause in his contract, paid to her a forfeit of 5,000 dollars and cancelled the mutual obligation. The clever Signorina will now seek engagements alone, and will doubtless succeed by playing at private Concerts and the like. For such work her personality has potent charms. Another failure, one that has in it suggestions of almost tragic sorrow, was that of Madame Gerster. The gifted Hungarian's popularity in America was second and third only to that of Mesdames Patti and Nilsson, and it was in reliance on that popularity that she ventured to arrange a Concert-tour with Mr. Henry E. Abbey, when it must have been known to her that her voice was not equal to the undertaking. The feeling toward Madame Gerster was very warm in New York, and in spite of the many private and public reports touching her vocal condition, which came from Europe, a splendid audience assembled to greet her at the Metropolitan Opera House. The disappointment of the public was a crushing one. Madame Gerster tried to sing "Una voce poco fa," and the fact was discovered with the first phrase that the beautiful voice which once entranced the multitude was a thing of the past. Not a trace of it was left, and in its place was an uneven, harsh, untuneful organ. Many of her old admirers were moved almost to tears, yet they applauded with affectionate warmth. The next morning most of the newspapers told the sorrowful truth with delicacy and kindness, but in a manner that could not be misunderstood. Madame Gerster went to New Haven and sang again. The sale of tickets had stopped short with the arrival of the New York newspapers containing the criticisms; the audience was small and undemonstrative, and though Madame Gerster sang better than in New York, she was far from being the Gerster of old. She was now convinced of her error, and consented to a cancellation of her contract. The tour was abandoned, and Mr. Abbey was left with a company of artists on his hands and no profitable occupation for them. The success of the Hofmann Concert, in which he has employed them, has saved him thus far, but it is recognised on all hands that they are a fifth wheel and a financial drag on the Hofmann waggon. The success of the Polish lad's Concerts is without parallel in recent musical annals. The sixth Concert will be given at the Metropolitan Opera House to-morrow evening. It is safe to say that thus far the receipts have been nearly, if not quite, 20,000 dollars, and there are as yet no signs of a lull in the popular enthusiasm, which is fed continually by articles in the newspapers. The critical opinion of New York does not differ essentially from that of London, though, as a rule, it is a little less conservative in the matter of expression. Signor Campanini is about opening his season in San Francisco, and a few reports of his journey thither have reached New York, though these few indicate that his business has been better than was expected. The American Opera Company is in the far west. The business done in Philadelphia and one or two other eastern cities was good. Favourable reports touching the artistic accomplishments of Madame Fursch-Madi, Miss Emma Juch, Mr. Barton McGuckin, Mr. Ludwig, and Mr. A. M. Sylva, the Belgian tenor, appears in the several newspapers, especially with regard to Mr. Barton McGuckin, who has recently added in America a new rôle to his operatic repertoire—viz., the principal tenor part in Goldmark's "Queen of Sheba." The press notices of Mr. McGuckin's performances are couched in the warmest terms of eulogy. In the German Opera at the Metropolitan Opera House, in this city, the only novelty of the month was Nessler's "Trompeter von Säckingen."

Success, both financial and artistic, seems to be crowning the musical activities of Boston. There are only a hundred unsold season tickets for the Saturday evening Concerts of the Symphony Orchestra, and none at all for the public rehearsal. In consequence, the project was mooted of giving extra Concerts for young people, similar to Mr. Thomas's in New York, and the experiment was tried, it seemed, successfully. The orchestra is announced for a Concert in Brooklyn and one in New York this week. With the Philharmonic Society, the Symphony Society, Mr. Thomas's Symphony and Young People's Concerts, and Mr. Van der Stucken's occasional Concerts to provide New York with orchestral music, the coming of Mr.

Gericke and his men is a good deal like carrying coals to Newcastle. It is evident that what the Boston artists are after is the approval of the New York newspaper press for the purposes of an extended tour later in the season. That they will obtain their desires is pretty certain, for the orchestra was much admired last season, and since then it has been greatly bettered in its one weak spot—the wood-wind. On the same evening last week the third part of Schumann's "Faust" music was sung by the New York Oratorio Society and the Cæcilia Club of Boston. This, with the production of Mozart's "Requiem" at the same Concert by the Oratorio Society, the first performance in America of Berlioz's "Te Deum" by the Apollo Club of Chicago, the first performance of Villiers Stanford's "Revenge" by the Mozart Society of Pittsburgh, and the announcement by the Nyack (New York) Choral Society of an intention to sing Dudley's Buck's "Light of Asia," are the most interesting pieces of choral information that November produced.

HER MAJESTY THE QUEEN has been graciously pleased to accept a copy of "A Short History of Cheap Music," recently published by Messrs. Novello. The copy accepted by Her Majesty was one of a few printed on specially prepared Japanese paper and bound in the highest style of the art.

It is a healthy sign when at each succeeding public Concert given by a young institution the evidence of advance is marked and distinct in every department. Such is undeniably the case with the Hyde Park Academy of Music, whose display at Steinway Hall, on the 15th ult., evinced improvement alike as regards numbers, material, and results of training. There were over twenty young ladies in the students' choir conducted by Mr. H. F. Frost, all capital voices, well taught, and capable of singing with accurate intonation and a careful observance of nuances. These qualities were made agreeably manifest in Mendelssohn's Motett "O Praise the Lord" (solos by Miss N. Dieseldorff, Miss de Hochepeid-Larpent, and Miss Brooke-Clarke), in Schubert's "Serenade" (solo, Miss Janet Tatham), and in part-songs by Miss Mary Carmichael. Yet more creditable was the rendering of a selection of pieces, requiring female voices only, from Signor Mancinelli's Cantata "Isaiah." This by no means easy music had not been heard before in London, and its performance was therefore of special interest, apart from demonstrating how thoroughly vocal it is and how effective a few well-trained voices can make it without the aid of an orchestra—here replaced by a piano and harmonium. The dignified opening chorus in the Temple, "We seek Theine altar, O Highest," and the tripping chorus of Hebrew Maidens, "See the beautiful branches above," were really admirably sung; while the duet "Sister of Hezekiah" found satisfactory exponents in Mrs. White and Miss J. Tatham. Mr. Frost conducted in a manner that showed him to be entirely en rapport alike with theme and executants, and he may fairly be felicitated on the outcome of a somewhat bold experiment. Among the vocalists of the evening was Miss Mary Willis, a clever pupil of the late Madame Sainton-Dolby, and herself the instructor of most of the singers whose efforts did such credit to the Hyde Park Academy. Miss Mary Carmichael and Mr. Frank Dawes accompanied at the piano-forte, and the latter assisted Mr. Frost at the harmonium.

A CROWDED and fashionable audience attended the Concert given by the Strolling Players' Orchestral Society at St. James's Hall on the 10th ult. The programme was well selected, and not wanting in special interest, including, as it did, Schubert's early Symphony in B flat (second of the nine), introduced ten years ago at the Crystal Palace, but now heard in London for the first time, curiously enough, on the anniversary of the date on which it was commenced—December 10, 1814. This tuneful work—so redolent of Mozart, yet not without its distinctive Schubertian touches—was extremely well played under Mr. Norfolk Megone, the Conductor of the Society. The band also acquitted itself very creditably in Weber's Overture, "The Ruler of the Spirits," and the picturesque ballet-music from Massenet's opera, "Le Cid." A less satisfactory performance was that of Scharwenka's Andante Religioso for strings, harp, and organ, an effective piece brought forward at the Promenade Concerts last season. The strings were unsteady, and their intonation doubtful; the harp was not heard; and the organ, which at Covent Garden had been inadequately replaced by a harmonium, now unduly predominated. Mdlle. Agnes Jansen and Miss Hamlin were the vocalists. The former was heard in songs by Cowen, Massenet, and Reissiger, and Miss Hamlin sang among other things Gounod's "Ave Maria," with the obbligati played by Mr. Pollitzer (violin), Mr. A. J. Caldicott (organ), and Mr. G. T. Mills (harp).

MR. WILLIAM NICHOLL gave a vocal Chamber Concert at Steinway Hall on the 16th ult., before a numerous and appreciative audience. As in former instances, the programme presented by this earnest young artist was marked by an eclectic spirit and the interest attaching to novelty. First in importance under the latter heading came a cycle of songs for four solo voices, with pianoforte accompaniment, entitled "Songs of the Stream," written by R. S. Hichens and composed by Mary Carmichael. We may bestow unreserved praise upon the composition; the lyrics are flowing and unaffected in sentiment, while the eleven numbers in which they are variously set as quartets, duets, and solos reveal notable grace of fancy and melodic charm in addition to expressive and musicianly treatment. Miss Carmichael played the accompaniments herself, and was fortunate in having for her interpreters so artistic a quartet of vocalists as Miss Louise Phillips, Miss Marguerite Hall, Mr. William Nicholl, and Mr. Herbert Thorndike. In the second part of the Concert Miss Phillips sang a couple of elegant little songs by C. A. Lidgey. Mr. Nicholl displayed his pleasing tenor voice and refined style to advantage in songs by Tosti and a new setting, by Frances Allitsen, of Whyte Melville's "Mary Hamilton." Miss Eva Harrison also sang, and Professor E. Savary d'Odiardi played some descriptive pieces on the Mustel organ.

A MEETING of the General Committee of the late Norwich Musical Festival was held at the Guildhall, Norwich, on Saturday, the 3rd ult., to receive the statement of accounts and to distribute the profits. The chair was occupied by Mr. Colman, M.P. Sir E. Birkbeck, M.P., and Mr. Hoare, M.P., were also present. The treasurer (Mr. P. E. Hansell) reported the total receipts to be £4,524 10s. 4d., and there remains a balance in hand of £719 3s. 1d. Of this amount it was resolved to distribute £400 among the principal local charities, and Sir E. Birkbeck expressed a hope that the claims of the Royal Agricultural Benevolent Institution would be taken into consideration on the occasion of the distribution of the profits of the next Festival. A cordial vote of thanks was given to Mr. Randegger (Conductor), and also to Signor Mancinelli, Sir A. Sullivan, Signor Bottesini, and Dr. Villiers Stanford for conducting their respective works. The sub-committee was re-appointed. The honorary secretary (Mr. C. R. Gillman) stated that a larger amount was retained in hand out of the balance this year in order to meet the increased expenses in connection with the chorus rehearsals and other matters between this and the next Festival. Mr. Colman also explained that the amount distributed bore a fair proportion to that voted to the charities in other years.

A CONGREGATION of upwards of 1,600 persons assembled at St. Peter's Church, Bayswater, on the 14th ult., to hear a performance of the "Creation" by eighty vocalists and forty instrumentalists, all trained in the Whitechapel, Clerkenwell, and Bermondsey Classes of the Popular Musical Union (formerly known as the Popular Ballad Concert Committee). All present seemed highly interested in this pilgrimage of East-end musicians to the West. The performance was for the benefit of the Kensington District Nursing Association for nursing the poor in their own homes. A handsome sum was realised by the collection. The same choir and orchestra gave a free service of song at Bermondsey Town Hall on New Year's eve, and will perform "The Messiah" at the People's Palace on January 21. There are upwards of 500 students under training at the East-end classes, at fees varying from 1d. to 4d. per lesson. The Duke of Westminster is President, and on the Committee are well-known musical amateurs, such as Mr. Threlfall, Mr. Littleton, Mr. Leo Schuster, and Mr. Morton Latham. The Secretary of the Society (which was founded by Mrs. Ernest Hart, and is partly supported by voluntary contributions) is Mr. J. S. Redmayne, B.A., 15, St. Mary's Square, Paddington.

THE second series of the Messrs. Hann's Chamber Concerts, given at the Gresham Hall, Brixton, concluded on the 2nd ult., when Haydn's Quartet in B flat (Op. 76, No. 4) and Rubinstein's Trio in B flat (Op. 32) were played with rare perfection of style and concordance of intention by members of this gifted family. Gade's Sonata in D minor (Op. 21), for pianoforte and violin, afforded Messrs. Sidney and Lewis Hann full opportunity for the exercise of their special talents. Mr. W. C. Hann, a clever violoncellist, gave some solos by Godard and Dunkler very effectively; and songs by Gounod and Handel were sung by Miss Hope Glenn with all possible expression. The Concerts—which have now ended for the season—have afforded their patrons and supporters the means of hearing intelligent and spirited readings of Spohr's Quartet in G minor (Op. 4, No. 2), Raff's Quintet in A minor (Op. 107), Beethoven's Quartet in F (Op. 18, No. 1), Schumann's Quartet in E flat (Op. 47), Mendelssohn's Sonata in D (Op. 58), for pianoforte and violoncello, besides other instrumental solos and duets. Vocal music has been contributed by Miss Mary Beare and Miss Agnes Larkcom, and the whole scheme has been as pleasurable as it has been artistic.

THE Enfield Musical Society gave their first Concert of the season on the 13th ult., at the Bycullah Athenæum, under the conductorship of Mr. John C. Ward. The artists were Madame Paget, Miss Frances Hipwell, Mr. Henry Guy, and Mr. Strugnell. A new dramatic Cantata "King Cophetua" (Behrend), was given for the first time in public, and met with a warm reception, the composer, who was present, receiving an enthusiastic call at the close of the performance. The work, which is sparkling and melodious, was admirably rendered by all concerned, the perfect preservation of the pitch by the choir in the unaccompanied numbers calling for special remark. A miscellaneous programme followed, in which Madame Paget, Miss Hipwell, and Mr. Henry Guy took part. Mr. H. Stanley Hawley presided at the piano, and contributed to the evening's enjoyment by his tasteful rendering of solos by Hiller and Chopin. He also joined Mr. J. C. Ward, the composer, in his Grand Polonaise in E flat, for concertina and pianoforte. The choir also sang several concerted pieces.

ON the evening of the 22nd ult., the annual Concert of the violin class students attached to the City of London College was given, under the direction of Mr. W. Fitzhenry. The class selections were played in a manner which reflected much credit on their painstaking and popular teacher. Miss Ethel Winn, Madame Charlton Kelly, Mr. Frank Ward, and Mr. J. Kift delighted an enthusiastic audience with their vocal selections; and Mr. Charles Fry recited "Horatius" and "The Charity Dinner," with admirable power and expression, the latter subject being treated in the inimitable way which Mr. Fry has made peculiarly his own. Mr. T. E. Gatehouse performed an Andante and Rondo from a Violin Concerto of Charles de Bériot, the well-known E flat Nocturne of Chopin (transcribed by Sarasate), and Papini's Saltarello; and Mrs. Fitzhenry and Mr. Kift presided at the pianoforte. The programme was excellent, and the audience evinced the liveliest satisfaction throughout the entire evening.

THE Borough of Hackney Choral Association deserves credit for including Mr. F. Corder's clever and effective Cantata "The Bridal of Triermain" in its programme for the present season. The work has scarcely as yet taken the position to which its merits entitle it, for music so fresh, melodious, and picturesque is certain to please any class of audience. The Shoreditch listeners, on the 12th ult., received it with the most enthusiastic demonstrations of approval, and the composer, who was present, had to appear on the platform and respond to deafening applause. The performance was, on the whole, praiseworthy, the choir singing with its wonted ability, while among the principal vocalists Miss Gertrude Turner and Mr. Musgrove Tufnell were especially commendable. Mr. Prout's excellent orchestra was heard to advantage in Haydn's Symphony in E flat, No. 3 (No. 10 of the Salomon set), and Mendelssohn's fine 114th Psalm completed a capital selection.

THE St. Barnabas (South Kensington) Choral Society gave their first Concert this season, under the conductorship of Mr. Fred. W. Lacy (Organist of the Church), on the 1st ult., in the Schoolroom, Devonshire Road, S.W. The programme comprised Locke's Music to "Macbeth," part-songs, "The winds" (Dr. Frost), "Good night, farewell" (Dr. Garrett), and "La Carita" (Rossini), solo by Miss Williamson; and various ballads, &c., which were given by members of the Society. The orchestra played the accompaniments to the "Macbeth" music, also the March from Costa's "Eli," and a new March, "Constitutional," by Mr. T. H. Goodwin, the Society's accompanist, which was encored. Mr. George Goodwin played a violin solo by Sainton, and, in response to an encore, gave Raff's Cavatina. Mr. T. H. Goodwin accompanied the various songs, &c., and played as a solo Moszkowski's Tarantella.

AT the Grocers' Company's School, on the 19th and the 21st ults., two interesting Concerts were given. Mr. R. T. Gibbons was Organist and accompanist, and Mr. H. Broughton Black, B.A., Musical Director and Conductor. The first part of the Concert consisted of miscellaneous selections, vocal and instrumental. The second part included a selection for band, organ, and pianoforte duet, by Mr. R. T. Gibbons, conducted by Mr. J. A. Worthington, and Mr. A. J. Caldicott's Operetta, "A Fishy Case; or, The Scales of Justice," arranged for the occasion by Mr. H. Broughton Black. The principal characters were sustained by Masters Whitworth, Bradford, Thomas, C. E. Brown, Stevens, Dolamore, E. Smith, and P. Smith, boys of the school choir. The construction of the stage, the scenery, the dresses, and the decorations, were all prepared by persons immediately connected with the school.

THE Streatham Choral Society gave the first Concert of its second season at the Assembly Room, Streatham Common, on Monday evening, the 19th ult., under the Conductorship of Mr. C. S. Macpherson, when Sir Arthur Sullivan's Oratorio "The Prodigal Son" and a miscellaneous selection were given. The Society has made a great advance in tone and attack upon its first season, and promises well for future performances. A notable feature in the programme was the rendering of two of Moszkowski's "German Rounds," for pianoforte duet, by Messrs. C. S. Macpherson and Herbert Lake, which met with a most enthusiastic demand for repetition, when one of Schumann's "Oriental pictures" was substituted. The other artists were Madame Wilson-Osman, Miss Helen Saunders, Mr. M. Humphreys, and Mr. B. H. Grove (vocalists), Mr. A. L. Spittle (violin), Messrs. Herbert Lake and H. E. Macpherson (accompanists at the harmonium and pianoforte).

AN Evening Concert was given by the City of London Choir and the London Sunday School Orchestral Band, on the 15th ult., at the Bow and Bromley Institute, Bow. The solo vocalist was Miss Rose Daforne, the leader and solo violin, Mr. John Saunders, the trumpets were Mr. T. Harper and Mr. J. Poulter, and there was a band and chorus of 200 performers. A most interesting programme was selected from the works of Wilbye, Handel, Haydn, Boccherini, Schubert, Mendelssohn, Gounod, F. H. Cowen, Knvett-Stewart, Goring Thomas, and David Davies who, with Mr. Luther Hinton, conducted the several pieces. Much pleasure was given by the performance, and the objects of the institution, which are to promote and improve part singing amongst Sunday School teachers and scholars, and to cultivate Christian Unity amongst Sunday School workers of all denominations, found fitting expression.

THE Tufnell Park Choral Society gave the first Concert of its sixteenth season on Tuesday evening, the 13th ult., when St. George's Room, Tufnell Park, was filled to overflowing by an appreciative audience. The attraction of the evening was "The Red Cross Knight," which has a romantic story written by Mr. Grist, and is set to vigorous and eminently descriptive music by Ebenezer Prout. The choir, under the direction of Mr. W. Henry Thomas, was thoroughly equal to the great demands made upon it, especially in the scene of the Tournament. The principals were Miss Clara Leighton (Lady Edith), Miss Cloudesley (Blondel), Mr. Harper Kearton (Roland), Mr. Bantock Pierpoint (Morice), and Mr. Frank Ward (King Richard), all of whom were thoroughly satisfactory in their respective characters, whilst Mr. Frank L. Thomas rendered valuable assistance on the pianoforte.

At Battersea Chapel, York Road, in October last, a series of "Sunday Afternoon Organ Recitals and Lectures for the People" was commenced, to be continued during the winter months. Up to the present eight Recitals have been given. The services of several good organists—notably Mr. H. J. B. Dart, Mr. H. W. Weston, and others—have been secured. Nearly all the programmes consisted of high class music. The object is to interest and elevate the working classes and the public generally by giving them something worth hearing on Sunday afternoons. The Concerts are entirely free—no collection even being taken—the expenses being defrayed from a fund raised by the minister of the Church, Rev. W. Hamilton. The charge of the musical arrangements has been entrusted to Mr. Arthur Newton, the Choirmaster and Organist of the Church.

The Lewisham Choral Society gave the first Concert of the season on Tuesday, the 13th ult., at the Schoolroom, Court Hill Road. The programme consisted of Gaul's "Ruth," and a miscellaneous second part. The soloists were Miss Ambler, Madame Schlüter, Signor Parisotti, and Mr. G. F. Sanders. A small band, led by Mr. W. W. Cobbett, accompanied. Miss Ambler was recalled for the solo "Let me hie unto the field," and with Madame Schlüter for the duet "With joyous heart." In the second part the band contributed Gounod's Overture "Mirella," Mr. J. D. Mackenzie a violoncello solo, and the choir some part-songs, "Now fie on love" and "Silv'ry Christmas bells," which were well received. Mr. H. E. Cockell conducted, in place of Mr. Arthur Brown who was incapacitated by illness.

The "Ladies' Night" of the Electro-Harmonic Society's second season, held on the evening of Friday, the 2nd ult., was well attended, and an excellent programme of high class music was presented. The vocalists were Madame Worrell, Miss Emily Foxcroft, Mr. Henry Guy, Mr. G. W. Forington, and Mr. Herbert Schartau. Mr. T. E. Gatehouse played the Andante and Finale from Mendelssohn's Violin Concerto, also an Aria and Gavotte from a Suite by Vieuxtemps, and Mr. Alfred Izard, the accompanist to the Society, performed as a pianoforte solo Rubinstein's Study in C. A new song, entitled "Victoria Regina," written and composed by Mr. C. E. Spagnoletti, a direct descendant of the eminent violinist of that name, and a past President of the Society of Telegraph Engineers and Electricians, was given for the first time.

The Concerts of music for wind instruments were continued at the Continental Gallery until the 23rd ult., and will be resumed on the 27th inst. They appear therefore to have supplied a decided want in the musical world. Most of the works presented have been, as a matter of course, unfamiliar to the public, but we are unable to speak of them in detail. Mozart's Quintet in E; his Serenade for oboe, clarinet, and bassoon; a Quintet in F, by Waterson; and a Quartet Concertante by Gebauer (Op. 41), have been given among other compositions. Favourable mention may be made of a tastefully written song, "Starry crowns of Heaven," by Miss Emily Hawkins, a student of the Royal Academy of Music, in which the accompaniments are for piano, horn, and harp.

The Westminster Amateur Orchestral Society gave a Concert at the Westminster Town Hall, on the 7th ult. A diversified and attractive programme was gone through, the principal instrumental items being a Symphony by Mozart, a spirited "Jubilee March" by Mr. C. S. Jekyll (played for the first time), and the Mendelssohn Violin Concerto. The solo in the last-named work was sustained by Miss Lucy Riley, a pupil of Dr. Joachim. She is a talented young lady, and her execution of her exacting task was such as to warrant high expectations for her future career. Madame Frickenhaus also appeared and performed two sets of pianoforte pieces with her accustomed artistic finish and irreproachable technique. The audience was large and enthusiastic.

A Concert was given by the Students of the Hampstead Conservatoire of Music on the 10th ult., at the Vestry Hall, Hampstead. The students who appeared were Miss Florence Copley, Miss Flora Stuart, Miss Mildred Harwood, Master Reade, Miss Tombleson, Miss Carr, Miss Ethel Haines, Mr. Arthur Jordan, Mrs. Geaussen, Miss Mabel Clark, Miss Cook, and Miss Chatenay. All of these displayed considerable proficiency in their studies, and gave evidence of the careful training received under the respective professors, Messrs. F. W. W. Bampfylde, J. Baptiste Calkin, G. F. Geaussen, and J. T. Hutchinson, at the institution, as did also the two students in elocution—Mrs. W. Nash and Miss Lucy Churchill (pupils of Mr. Charles Fry)—who gave their recitations very effectively.

The St. Mary's Choral Society, Bryanston Square, gave an Evening Concert on the 21st ult. Part 1 consisted of a selection from "Preciosa," by Weber, Miss Ethel Winn taking the solo. The overture and incidental dance music were played as duets by Miss Essie Bull and Miss Badcock. In Part 2 "Hero and Leander," by Charles Harford Lloyd, was performed. The part of Hero was taken by Miss Ethel Winn and that of Leander by Mr. W. Jones. Miss Winn's beautiful voice and singing gained for her the warmest applause, and imparted a special interest to an excellent performance. Mr. J. Carisbrooke Merrick, Organist and Director of the Choir, St. Peter's, Belsize Park, was the Conductor.

The appointment of Dr. Villiers Stanford as Music Professor in the University of Cambridge, in the room of the late Sir George Macfarren, is one that cannot fail to give general satisfaction to musicians. Indeed, it is difficult to perceive how the authorities could have arrived at any other decision. Dr. Stanford is resident at Cambridge, he is a graduate of the University, and as Conductor of the Musical Society he has done great service to the art by the presentation of new works and the revival of neglected masterpieces. His own compositions show him to be a Liberal-Conservative in technical and scientific matters, and his fitness for the duties of an examiner is, therefore, likely to be fully acknowledged.

Among the many performances of Spohr's "Last Judgment" during Advent which have come under our notice, that at St. Peter's, Eaton Square, on Friday, the 16th ult., may fairly be accounted one of the most effective. Mr. Sergison had obviously taken great pains in preparing his choir in the work, and he is specially to be congratulated on his trebles, whom many a Cathedral organist might envy. The immense church was crowded to the doors, and the Oratorio, as well as the form of prayer which preceded and followed it, was received with the most reverent attention. Religion and art are alike served by functions of this nature.

On the 6th ult., at the Horns Assembly Rooms, Kennington Park, S.E., a very successful Concert was given by the West Lambeth (Teachers') Choral Society. There was a full orchestra and chorus of 150 performers. The first part of the programme consisted of selections from "The Messiah," the second part being devoted to songs and opera choruses. The principal performers were Miss Hattie Hickling, Miss Annie Morley, Mr. Edward Branscombe, and Mr. Edward Mills. Miss E. L. Newman was the accompanist, and Herr E. von Benzon the leader of the orchestra. The Conductor was Mr. E. Eugène Trydell.

A Concert was given by the Beckenham School of Music, on the 6th ult., at the Public Hall. Mr. Sims Reeves was announced but was unable to appear, and sent a telegram and a letter of regret and explanation, which was read from the platform. The services of Mr. and Madame Boulcot Newth, Mr. Vivian Bennett, Mr. John Saunders (violinist), and Miss Frances E. Smith were secured. Some glees and part-songs were well sung by Messrs. Schartau, Carter, Parkin, and Hubbard. Miss A. Merryman, Miss L. F. Long, and Miss Mina Martin, pupils of the school, discharged their tasks satisfactorily. Mr. Alfred Izard was the accompanist.

On Wednesday, the 7th ult., the Hammersmith and Shepherd's Bush Sacred Choral Union gave a performance of Handel's "Messiah," at Oaklands Chapel, Shepherd's Bush. The rendition of the work was in all respects most satisfactory. The soloists were Madame Minnie Gwynne, Miss Lucie Johnstone, Mr. Vivian Bennett, and Mr. Wilfred Jones, all of whom acquitted themselves most ably. Miss Millen and Mr. R. W. Lewis presided at the pianoforte and organ respectively with much ability. The Conductor of the Society, Mr. C. G. Bell, fulfilled his duty with care and discretion.

ON the 1st ult., at St. Mark's Parish Room, Kensington, a Concert was given in connection with the North Kensington Constitutional Club, by Mr. W. A. Philpott. The vocalists were Miss F. Montagu-Conyers, Miss A. Montagu-Conyers, Miss Emma Barker, Miss Maude Hayter, Madame Wollaston-Romilly. Mr. Victor Romilly, Mr. J. Winspeare McCarty, Mr. J. G. Ives, and Mr. W. Vine. Instrumentalists—violin, Mr. F. Carter; violoncello, Mr. R. Carter; pianoforte, Mons. Henri Logé, Mr. Warren Tear, Mr. Blanchamp, and Miss Edith Earl. Mr. W. A. Philpott, Conductor.

MONS. ALEX. GUILMANT gave an interesting Organ Recital at Christ Church, Westminster Bridge Road, on Tuesday, the 6th ult. Among many interesting items, his programme included his own Marche Funèbre and Chant Seraphique, and Sonata, No. 1 (Symphonia); also, his arrangement of Handel's Tenth Concerto. These were played with great brilliancy, and gave intense satisfaction to the large audience. The organ selections were relieved by vocal solos, sung by Madame Madeline Hardy, and Anthems rendered by the Christ Church choir. Mr. J. R. Griffiths accompanied.

THE first Concert (seventh season) of the All Saints' Choral Society, Clapton, E., took place on the 1st ult., when, in memory of Sir G. A. Macfarren (a Vice-President of the Society), his Cantata, "May Day," was performed; also a miscellaneous selection, including Beethoven's Fourth Trio in B flat, for pianoforte, violin, and violoncello, finely rendered by Mr. Henry J. Wood, Mr. Benoni Brewer, and Mr. C. H. Allen Gill. The solo vocalists (from the Royal Academy of Music) were Miss Kate Norman, Miss Hannah Jones, Mr. Padarn Lewis, and Mr. B. H. Grove. The Concert was conducted by Mr. Henry J. Wood.

A DEDICATION Festival Service was held in St. Andrew Undershaft, E.C., on St. Andrew's Day (November 30). There was an augmented choir of about sixty-five voices, accompanied throughout by the Church Orchestral Society of eighteen players and organ (Organist, Mr. Arthur Trickett); Conductor, Mr. W. M. Wait (Organist of St. Andrew Undershaft). Chants for Psalms, by Mr. Arthur Trickett; Magnificat and Nunc dimittis (Gadsby in C); Anthems, "Praise Jehovah" (Mendelssohn) and "Hallelujah" (Beethoven); Voluntaries, "March in F" (W. M. Wait) and Concerto, No. 2, in B flat (Handel).

THE seventh season of the Civil Service Vocal Union was successfully inaugurated on Thursday evening, the 1st ult., by a Smoking Concert, in the great hall at Cannon Street Hotel. Among the choral items Schubert's "Night in the Forest" and Gernsheim's "Salamis" call for especial praise, and a well deserved encore was accorded to the bold "Thor's War Song," composed by the honorary Conductor, Mr. J. H. Maunder. The programme also obtained efficient support at the hands of Mr. Harper Kearton, Mr. Donnell Balfie, Mr. George Micklewood, Mr. Howard Reynold (cornet-à-pistons), and Mr. Sidney Boulton (reciter).

THE St. Augustine's (Honor Oak) Choral Society gave its third Concert on the 19th ult., part one consisting of a very effective performance of Mendelssohn's "Athalie." This was the first time the Society had secured the advantage of orchestral assistance, and on this occasion a small but efficient band, under the leadership of Mr. Walter Cobbett, supplemented the piano, played by Madame Brett and Miss Evelyn Seymour-Smith. Part two comprised vocal and instrumental solos, and some part-songs, one of the latter, "Good Evening," being a pleasant little composition by the Society's Conductor, Mr. Seymour Smith.

MR. H. W. WESTON, F.C.O., gave a Recital at Battersea Chapel to a very large audience on Sunday afternoon, November 27, when the programme included Mendelssohn's Overture "Ruy Blas," a Concerto by Handel, and works by Gounod, Massenet, C. M. Widor, and Wagner. The same gentleman also played a Recital at St. Nicholas, Cole

Abbey, E.C., on November 29, when the scheme included a fine Fantasia and Fugue in A minor by Merkel, a Toccata by Dubois, two movements from Rheinberger's Eighth Sonata, and works by Smart, Wagner, and W. T. Best.

ON Tuesday evening, November 29, an excellent Concert was given by some of the members of the North-East London Choral Society, in Christ Church Hall, South Hackney; the programme consisted of Dr. J. F. Bridge's Motett "Hymn to the Creator," and a miscellaneous selection of anthems, part-songs, trios, duets, &c. The soloists were Madame Clara West, Miss Lottie West, Mr. George Goodspeed, and Mr. Charles Prickett. Conductor, Mr. John E. West, F.C.O. There was a large and appreciative audience.

It is proposed to erect a Memorial to the late Mr. J. T. Frye, in the form of a stained glass window to be placed in the Parish Church, Saffron Walden, where, for a period of sixty-four years, he officiated as organist. Subscriptions may be sent to Messrs. Gibson, Tuke, and Gibson, paid to "The Frye Memorial" account at their Bank. The committee propose entrusting the work to Messrs. Clayton and Bell, of 311, Regent Street, London, and it is estimated that about £250 will be required to carry it out satisfactorily.

AT Holy Trinity Church, Clarence Road, Kentish Town, Spohr's "Last Judgment" was sung on the Sunday evenings in Advent after Evensong. The soloists were Masters H. Williams, Elliott, and Porter (sopranos), Mr. F. Cleate (tenor), and Mr. Abbey Yorke (bass). Mr. A. Cunliffe Smith, the hon. Choirmaster and Organist, conducted, and Mr. W. J. Thompson presided at the organ. These Services were well attended. On Christmas evening the Christmas portion of "The Messiah" was sung as the Anthem, with orchestral accompaniment.

MR. E. VAN DER STRAETEN's first Concert of Chamber Music took place at the Steinway Hall, on Monday, the 12th ult. The programme included Beethoven's String Quartet in C minor (Op. 18), Corelli's Sonata for violoncello, Max Bruch's Romance for violin, and a Manuscript Quintet for piano and strings by Mr. Walter Wesché. This work was performed for the first time, the composer presiding at the piano. The Concert-giver was ably assisted by Messrs. Teiffert, Friedel, and Evans, and Miss Ernestine Teiffert, who sang songs by Brahms and Goring Thomas.

THE Kyrle Choir, under the direction of Mr. F. A. W. Docker, gave a performance of "Elijah" on November 30, in St. Augustine's Church, Bermondsey. The soloists were Miss Mary Bliss, Mrs. Dean, Mr. Wellman, and Mr. James Blackney. On the 7th ult. the choir sang "The Messiah" in a Congregational Church at Canning Town. The soloists were Miss Marianne Rea, Miss Ellen Cooper, Mr. Edward Branscombe, and Mr. Frank Swinford. Mr. E. H. Turpin accompanied on the organ on both occasions.

ON Sunday afternoon, the 18th ult., Mr. G. Augustus Holmes gave his usual monthly Organ Recital at St. George's, Camberwell, assisted by an orchestra under the direction of Mr. J. Turner. The programme, which included several items appropriate to Christmastide, was rendered throughout in a highly efficient manner, to the evident satisfaction of the large audience assembled. The vocalists were Miss Lydia Davies, Mr. Alfred Mori, and Mr. Horace Petley.

THE Annual Distribution of Prizes of the London Society for Teaching the Blind to Read, and for Training them to Industrial Occupations, took place on Wednesday, the 14th ult., at Upper Avenue Road, Swiss Cottage, N.W., when the Right Hon. Sir Henry Holland, Bart., M.P., G.C.M.G., was in the chair. A selection of music by Shield, Weber, Haydn, and Attwood, under the direction of Mr. Edwin Barnes, was sung by the pupils after the prizes were distributed.

ON the 15th ult., the Woodside Park Musical Society commenced the season with an excellent performance of Mendelssohn's "St. Paul." The chorus, much improved, rendered most of the numbers with precision. The soloists were Miss Mary Beare, Madame Florence Winn, Mr. John Probert, and Mr. Bridson. The accompaniments consisted of a professional string quintet, led by Mr. S. Dean Grimson; piano, Mrs. Williams; harmonium, Mr. Frank Figg; Mr. Alfred J. Dye conducted.

THE St. Mark's Choral Society gave a Concert at St. Mark's Vestry Room, Battersea Rise, on the 14th ult., when Mendelssohn's 42nd Psalm and Spohr's "God, Thou art great," were performed. The principal soloists were Madame Isabel George, Miss Rose Dafforne, Messrs. E. Bryant and J. Budd. Mr. H. Bray, the Conductor, may be especially congratulated on the very excellent training of his choir. A miscellaneous selection formed the second part, when some part-songs, &c., were well rendered by the choir, and solos by the artists named and Messrs. C. Lockwood and E. Bowles.

THE Clapham Choral Society gave a Concert at Belmont Hall, Grafton Square, on the 19th ult. The solo vocalists were Madame Worrell, Miss Lucy Etheridge, and Mr. Musgrove Tufnail. The Conductor was Mr. Walter Mackway, and Mr. Sidney H. Hann was the accompanist. The first part consisted of a selection of music by Beethoven, A. H. Behrend, Gounod, and Mendelssohn; and in the second part Heinrich Hofmann's "Cinderella" was admirably performed.

ON the evening of Tuesday, November 29, a Concert was given in the Tate Institute at Silvertown, under the direction of Mr. C. Gray. The artists were the Misses Ethel Winn and Flora Edwards; Messrs. Edward Dalzell, G. W. Forington, and Mr. Herbert Schartau, with Mr. T. E. Gatehouse (violin) and Mr. C. S. Macpherson, solo pianist and accompanist. The vocal and instrumental selections were appreciated by a large audience.

GAUL'S "Holy City" was performed on St. Andrew's Day, at St. Andrew's, Ashley Place, Victoria Street. The soprano solos were sung by Miss Annie Swinfen and Miss Edith Luke. Mr. R. Long was the tenor, and the bass solos were sung by Mr. Thornton Colvin. Mr. W. Hatch conducted, and Dr. Pearce presided at the organ. There was a small but efficient orchestra, and the choir was augmented for the occasion.

MR. TAYLEUR'S Concert on the 16th ult., at the New Lecture Hall, Holly Park, in aid of the Organ Fund was a great success. The performers were Madame Whitmore Lowe, Miss Annie Swinfen, Miss Lillian Webster, Mrs. C. J. Harrison, Mr. J. Colin Palmer, Mr. Herbert Nash, Mr. C. Shapcott (cornet), and Mr. W. G. Forington. The accompanists were Miss Maud Johnston and Mr. Arthur B. Hodge.

THE choir of St. John's, Waterloo Road, S.E., gave two performances of Spohr's Oratorio "The Last Judgment," on the 1st and 15th ult.; also the second part of the same work on Sunday evenings, the 4th and 22nd ult. These performances (which are free) are given by the voluntary choir of the church, under the direction of the Organist, Mr. Henry J. B. Dart.

AT the People's Palace, Mile End, the twelfth of a series of Popular Concerts was given on November 30 (St. Andrew's Day). Several Scotch songs were sung by Madame Catherine Penna, Miss Frances Harrison, Mr. Sinclair Dunn, and Mr. Gerald Phillips. Besides the vocal pieces, the programme contained several organ solos by Mr. Edwin Barnes.

THE Grosvenor Choral Society gave their 190th monthly Concert at the Grosvenor Hall, on Friday evening, the 16th ult., when "The Messiah" was performed. The choruses were well rendered by the choir. The soloists were Miss Ada Beck, Miss Annie Dweley, Mr. James Gawthrop, and Mr. B. H. Grove. Mr. H. C. Tonking presided at the organ, and Mr. David Woodhouse conducted.

THE Musical Artists gave a Concert at Willis's Rooms on the 10th ult., when compositions by Algernon Ashton, W. Macfarren, T. B. Knott, Aguilar, Ethel M. Boyce, A. O'Leary, Sullivan, and G. Gear were performed and duly appreciated. The date had been altered from November 5, and a quartet and other concerted music had to be omitted owing to the change.

A SPECIAL Service of Advent music was held at St. Pancras Church, Euston Road, on the 21st ult., when several anthems and hymns were sung by the choir, and Mr. W. A. Frost, of St. Paul's Cathedral, sang Handel's

"O Thou that tellest." He also took part with members of the choir in Goss's "Wilderness" and Barnby's "It is high time to awake out of sleep."

MR. EDMUND ROGERS has recently received a beautifully engrossed copy of a resolution, passed by the members of the Wilkinsburg Musical Club, Pennsylvania, acknowledging the dedication of a chorus, entitled "The Crusaders," which he had been commissioned to write for them.

THERE is no truth in the report, current both in London and in Cambridge, that Sir Arthur Sullivan and Dr. Stainer were among the candidates for the Cambridge Professorship. They neither sent in their applications nor had any idea of so doing.

GAUL'S "Holy City" was performed in St. Saviour's, Denmark Park, on the 16th ult. The soloists were Madame Worrell, Miss Lena Law, Mr. H. Fulkerson, and Mr. Frederick Bevan. The Rev. W. H. Wilkins conducted. Mr. W. J. Kippis presided at the organ.

THE Paddington Chapel Choral Union gave Handel's "Messiah," on the 6th ult., the soloists being Mesdames Clara West and Coyte Turner, Messrs. J. H. Mullerhausen and Thurley Beale. Organist, Mr. H. G. Holmes. Conductor, Mr. J. H. Moon.

THE second annual Dinner of the Old Choristers of St. Paul's Cathedral will be held at the Holborn Restaurant, on Thursday, the 5th inst. The chair will be taken by Mr. Henry Gadsby and Dr. Stainer will occupy the vice-chair.

MR. A. H. WHITE, who has just retired from the post of Organist and Choirmaster at St. Paul's Church, Herne Hill, has been presented by the members of the choir with a silver tankard, "as a token of regard." Mr. White also received a gold watch from the congregation.

MR. ALBERT B. BACH, of Edinburgh, has, in recognition of his works on vocal art, been unanimously elected an honorary member of the Royal Academy of Music of Florence.

THE competition for the Hine Gift at the Royal Academy of Music was decided on Saturday, the 17th ult. There were three candidates, and it was awarded to Avise Boxall.

M. AUGUSTE CHARLES LAHURE, the well known printer and publisher, died in Paris on the 14th ult.

REVIEWS.

Musical Instruments: Historic, Rare, and Unique.

[Edinburgh: A. and C. Black.]

THE musical instruments depicted in this superb volume include many that were exhibited at the Royal Albert Hall in 1885, at the Exposition of Music and Inventions, together with some from out of private collections lent for the purpose of showing the various forms of "Musick-making machines" brought from many countries and preserved through many ages. They have been also selected with a secondary object—that of showing the beauty of decorative art expended on the designs and ornamentation. The drawings made by Mr. William Gibb and reproduced in the highest style of chromo-lithography are among the most beautiful examples of printing it is possible to obtain. Nothing of the kind has ever been attempted in this country before, therefore the book, like many of the instruments whose images it preserves, is unique. It would be easy to indulge in much speculation concerning the treasures portrayed, for herein are shown Queen Elizabeth's Virginals, the Lute played upon by her own hands, the Harp of Mary Queen of Scots, the Guitar of the ill-fated Rizzio, the ancient Lamont Harp, an Oliphant or Ivory Hunting Horn or Trumpet, exquisitely carved, the Burgmote Horns of Dover and Canterbury, which called together the towns-fathers to a solemn conclave; Lutes, Ceteras, Banduras, Guitars, including one made by Stradivarius, some of whose fiddles are also shown, Spinets, Harpsichords, Bagpipes, the Hurdy-gurdy, Stringed and Wood-wind Instruments from India, China, Japan, besides the Ancient Roman Lituus and Buccina in the fifty beautiful plates contained in the work. The older musical books of Luscinius, Mersenne, Kircher, Prætorius, and others which contain pictures of musical instruments are scarce, and are gladly purchased for their rarity and historical value. The present book towers above all for its artistic merit, and as only a limited number is printed, it will be prized by those who now possess it, and will become as eagerly sought after in time to come when in the ordinary course of things copies will come upon the market.

For musical readers the worth of the book does not stand entirely upon the attraction of the pictures, beautiful as they are. The descriptive introduction, which shows the relative dependence of the specimens contained in the work in their historical and artistic aspect, as well as the details of each group, have been furnished by Mr. A. J. Hipkins, F.S.A. This is a guarantee that the work has been ably and completely done. The geniality of his style of writing will delight those who read the book for the information it presents, while the student of music who can thoroughly appreciate the immense research and labour involved will be grateful for the pleasant and trustworthy information given upon a subject of which the writer is a perfect master. Enough is said to satisfy all reasonable curiosity. The references are suggestive rather than exhaustive, yet the reader is placed upon the right track, should he desire to prosecute his enquiries further.

Mr. Hipkins speaks of the peculiar qualities of tone of some of the instruments, such as is found in the old spinets, harpsichords, and certain of the disused wood-wind instruments. Would it not be possible to restore such tones? What can be more delightful or satisfying in its way than the quality of sound produced from an old harpsichord? The modern pianoforte with all its charms has nothing like the soothing character of the old string tone, even though it was once sneeringly described as "a scratch with a sound at the end of it." Such a "scratch" was all that musicians like Scarlatti, Bach, Handel, and the composers of all Europe in the early part of the seventeenth century could command. For such effects much of their music was written. Even now, with ears accustomed to the fuller, richer tones of a noble Broadwood grand, the music written for, and played upon a harpsichord, possesses full meaning, and inspires the hearer as well as the player with great wonder at the genius of the men who could deal so deftly with the means at command.

If the spirit of the age is most in favour of magnified tone, the hope for the restoration of bygone mildness of sound may be chimerical. But there is one more lesson which Mr. Hipkins offers, which may be taken to heart and be made the incentive to future effort. That is it which is found in the charm of the decorations and designs which many of the old instruments exhibit. The "beauty of form and tastefulness of adornment which still make them, even when their sound is obscured or forgotten, a source of æsthetic delight," might certainly inspire the makers of modern instruments with a wish to emulate, if not to surpass, the old makers of "musical instruments," so that their labours, like those of the artists whose works adorn the pages of this noble book, may become the admiration and delight of posterity as well as a source of pleasure to those for whom they were designed.

Dainty Ditties; or, Old Nursery Rhymes with New Tunes. By Frank J. Allen. [Novello, Ewer and Co.]

THE list of titles of these "Dainty Ditties" shows a catalogue of verses familiar to all. The chief of the old stories, songs, and legendary poems of the nursery are included in the collection and set to new music, which is in every way calculated to attract young minds and catch infant ears. It would be difficult, of course, to dis sever the traditional tunes associated with many of the words, but in those cases where the tradition is uncertain and doubt exists as to the accuracy of certain melodies, Mr. Allen's Ditties may be adopted, and so perhaps help to set the matter at rest, if it is worth while doing so. Mr. Allen seems to have kept in view the requirements and capacities of the young folk for whose use he has compiled his book, for not only are the melodies simple and easily learned, but the accompaniments are without difficulties and are easily played.

Sylvan Echoes. Duets for Female Voices. Composed by Oliver King. [J. and T. Hopkinson.]

MUSIC for female voices is now so much sought after that every contribution designed to minister to the want is eagerly welcomed. Mr. Oliver King's five duets, words by Edward Oxenford, are well written and melodious, though they are not entirely without a certain restlessness in modulation which may be deemed characteristic, though if it be indulged in to more than a moderate extent, suggests eccentricity, rather than originality in a straight path. There is in more than one of the five duets, notably in those called "The day is ending," "Sweet evening bells," and "Come, western wind," a spirit of poetry in the setting beyond that contained in the words, which enhances the musical value of these "Sylvan echoes."

Morceaux de Salon. Composed by Joachim Raff. Albums for Violin and Pianoforte (No. 9).

[Novello, Ewer and Co.]

VIOLIN players who already know these compositions will be glad to find them collected and issued in the handy and handsome form adopted for Novello, Ewer and Co.'s Albums for Violin and Pianoforte. The six pieces belong to the Op. 85 of the composer, and include a Marcia in C minor, a Pastorale in A, the well-known Cavatina in D, Scherzino in G minor, the melodious Canzona in E, and the brilliant Tarantella in E. The Album, containing, as it does, pieces which represent all styles, should be in the possession of all violin players.

The Congregational Church Hymnal (Sol-fa Edition).

[Hodder and Stoughton.]

A NOTICE of this excellent collection has already appeared in the columns of a recent number of THE MUSICAL TIMES. There is therefore no need to do more than call attention to the fact that the publishers have issued an edition in Tonic Sol-fa notation for the benefit of those who are unable to read from the established notation. It is as clearly and elegantly printed as the original form.

Compositions of Halfdan Kjerulf. Novello, Ewer and Co.'s Pianoforte Albums, Nos. 29, 30, 31. Edited by Berthold Tours. [Novello, Ewer and Co.]

THE author of the pleasing and clever pieces contained in the three parts of the "Pianoforte Album" was born in Sweden in 1815, and died in 1868. He was the composer of a number of instrumental and vocal works. Some of his songs have found their way into this country, and have earned for themselves a tribute of admiration. The selection from his pianoforte writings here given includes some of his songs arranged for the "household orchestra." They bear evidence of the original melodic powers of the composer, while the other numbers in the books, with them, show his skill as a writer for the pianoforte. Counting the songs as one, there are twenty-three compositions in all in the three works. They are in varied forms, and of different degrees of difficulty. Therefore, in addition to the pleasure which they would bring to the expert player, they would be found most valuable for teaching purposes. More than one bear evidence of tonalities peculiar to the country of the birth of the composer, and these "fall with fresh cadence on the wearied ear," and impart a piquancy to the melodies and harmonies which is not without its value in these days, when so much that is commonplace and of familiar pattern is daily poured from the press.

The Two Margarets, and John Frazer. Two Ballads. By A. C. Mackenzie. [Paterson and Sons.]

DR. MACKENZIE, in his setting of these words by John Stuart Blackie, has caught the spirit of the old ballad melodies in the happiest style. While maintaining his own originality, he appears to have endeavoured to make the traditional cadence of ballad melody his pattern, and he has been so far successful that his music imparts a full dramatic pathos to the words. These words are couched in a tone which will limit their acceptance to the few who can still be moved with righteous indignation for errors which probably have long been condoned.

Lord Ullin's Daughter. By Hamish MacCunn. Op. 4.
[Novello, Ewer and Co.]

CAMPBELL'S poem has only hitherto been set as a ballad. It is somewhat remarkable that in the search for good words for a short Cantata which should contain the elements of the heroic, the dramatic, and the pathetic that it should have escaped notice until now. Mr. Hamish MacCunn is one of the rising Scottish composers whom it is a pleasure to welcome. He approaches his subject by a way such as might be expected from a compatriot of the poet. He brings a special feeling for local colour to aid him in depicting the scene he has proposed to illustrate. Therefore his music, which breathes of the Highlands, is both full of proper character and dramatic power. It is set for chorus and orchestra, and is strikingly effective from first to last. It is dedicated to the Glasgow Choral Union, and will be gladly received by Choral Societies throughout the length and breadth of the land.

Four Sonnets by Shakespeare. With a German Version by F. Bodenstedt. Set to music by C. Hubert H. Parry.
[Stanley Lucas, Weber and Co.]

CONSIDERING how often the efforts of a vocal composer are directed towards covering the defects of the words by his music, it is refreshing to find a work in which his energies have been taxed to render the musical setting worthy of the words. Mr. Parry is one of the few who is evidently desirous on every opportunity to ally himself with a poet; and even had he not been as successful as he has been, we owe him a debt of gratitude for his good intentions. We cannot say that we consider his treatment of the four Sonnets in the book before us equal in merit; but they are all composed with due reverence for the beauty of the text, and evidence the hand of an artist throughout. Instances of redundant harmonies and of over elaboration occasionally occur, as, for example, in the Sonnet commencing "When to the sessions of sweet silent thought"; but there is no careless writing, and the voice is always duly considered. Our favourites are decidedly Sonnets xxix. and xviii., the latter, especially, being full of poetical feeling. We must also say that the pianoforte part lies well under the fingers in every piece, and that the German version of the poetry is, as a rule, fairly sympathetic with the music.

Twelve Pieces. By Oliver King. Novello, Ewer and Co.'s Albums for Violin and Pianoforte.
[Novello, Ewer and Co.]

ADVANCED students of the violin will doubtless be glad to make acquaintance with these clever and effective compositions. They are here and there tinged with peculiarities in harmony and construction, the full force of which does not appear at first sight. When they are studied these characteristics develop, and the music improves upon further knowledge. They will find a good place in the estimation of drawing-room performers as worthy contributions in supply of a growing demand. They are, moreover, interesting enough to be added to the répertoires of public players.

Five o'clock Tea. A fairy Kindergarten Cantata. Written by Kate Osborne. Music by Thomas Murby.
[T. Murby.]

JUVENILE literature has long been an important branch of art industry, and juvenile music is now rapidly assuming a position of no mean significance. We are not concerned here with the merits of Froebel's Kindergarten system, and it is not absolutely necessary that the little ones who take part in the present Cantata should have studied in a Kindergarten school. Children are always ready enough to "make believe," and in Mr. Murby's work, which is laid out in the manner of a drawing-room operetta, some of the characters have to assume costumes suggestive of the various industries connected with tea-drinking. But there is no story or anything calculated to offend persons susceptible on the subject of "stage plays." Mr. Murby's music is written with due regard for the capabilities of youthful vocalists. The choruses are in three parts, but simplicity is studiously observed, and the solo voices have only to maintain the medium register throughout. The composer shows himself an adept in work of this kind, and he may be encouraged to persevere.

Soft Voluntaries for the Organ. By George Calkin. Book 9. [Novello, Ewer and Co.]

LIKE its companions, this book contains six pieces, three in the major and three in the minor mode. We have already referred to the first-rate musicianship and pleasing qualities of Mr. Calkin's compositions, and the present instalment shows no falling off from the high standard noted in the others. On the contrary, the pieces are uniformly attractive, and organists will find them most acceptable as voluntaries. Opinions may differ as to which numbers of the set are the most tuneful, but we are inclined to divide the award between an Andantino in F minor, and an Andante in A, both melodic gems. All the rest, however, possess merits which, in several ways, entitle them to equal consideration.

Jesu, Lover of my soul. Sacred Song. By Berthold Tours. [Robert Cocks and Co.]

SONGS of a religious character must be in increasing demand if we may judge by the supply. The majority of them have unmeaning or morbidly sentimental words, but of course no objection can be made to Charles Wesley's favourite hymn as the basis of a lyric. Mr. Tours's setting is in classical song form—principal section, episode, return of first theme, and peroration. That it is musicianly goes without saying, but it is also as simple and devotional as the nature of the verses requires. In the third verse, however, the composer works up to a fervid and expressive close with ff chords, slightly recalling the manner of Gounod. The song will suit mezzo-soprano, second tenor, or baritone voice.

Seek ye the Lord. By Hague Kinsey. (Octavo Anthems, No. 319.) [Novello, Ewer and Co.]

THE name of Mr. Kinsey is scarcely familiar yet as a composer of church music, but if he continues as he has begun it soon will be. This little full Anthem has all the qualities needed to secure it wide acceptance. It is within the means of ordinary amateur choirs, it is dignified and churchlike, and it is remarkably pleasing. A vein of agreeable, yet never frivolous, tune pervades it throughout, and some of the harmonic progressions are fresh and unconventional without being extravagant.

Bayreuth and Franconian Switzerland. By R. Milner Barry. [Swan Sonnenschein, Lowrey and Co.]

THIS is a sketchy account of the experiences of three ladies who visited Bayreuth for the Wagner Festival. It opens with a description of Bamberg and its cathedral, where they halted for a night. The chief interest of the book for musicians is centred in the notice of Bayreuth and the various places of interest around about, of the graves of Liszt and Wagner, and the somewhat lengthy, if not brilliant, descriptions of the plots of "Parsifal" and "Tristan and Isolde," and other matters more or less interesting. On leaving Bayreuth they visited various small places not usually touched by their countrywomen in Franconian Switzerland, each place being briefly described. The book is illustrated with a few maps and views.

Centennial Biographic Sketch of Charles Cowden-Clarke.
[Printed for private circulation.]

THE authoress of this little book, "her whom he made his second self," tells in pleasant language the simple story of the life and work of a man who was at one time a prominent figure in the literary and artistic world. Born on December 15, 1787, Charles Cowden-Clarke numbered among his friends and acquaintances many of the great men of the time, while his own labours as a lecturer, as a commentator upon and ardent lover of Shakespeare's works, earned for him distinction in his career. He retired to Italy, where he spent his last days, living to the great age of ninety, beloved by all who knew him. The story of his life and associations is most agreeably told in the little book issued on the hundredth anniversary of his birth. The description of their courtship and early married life is most charming and poetical, and although other scenes are described with much power, that one will doubtless be regarded as the sweetest piece of word-painting in the book.

Dramaturgie der Oper. Von Heinrich Bulthaupt.
[Leipzig: Breitkopf und Härtel.]

THE story of the rise and progress of dramatic art has been told over and over again by many writers. Each has brought a special amount of ability to bear upon the subject, and all works of this character, in whatever tongue they are written, never fail to attract the general reader. The love for the stage and the delight in the stories which may be told concerning it knows no weakening. Therefore the present work is secure of an interested following. It treats of the development of the principles culminating in the Wagnerian music-drama, as exemplified in the works of the musicians and poets of the earliest time. Taking Gluck as his starting point the author incidentally treats of the labours of his predecessors as indicative of the state of art at the time when the composer of "Orpheus" sought to effect his reforms, not only in musical art, but in the dramaturgy of the opera. His sympathies are wholly with the German examples of operatic art, and as his researches have been chiefly directed towards its exaltation his work must be assessed from his own point of view. He tells nothing concerning Gluck that is not already well known, yet his manner is pleasant and shrewd even in telling old stories. He naturally dwells upon the music of Mozart at some length, selecting for critical examination four works "Die Entführung aus den Serail" ("The Seraglio"), "Figaro's Hochzeit" ("The Marriage of Figaro"), "Don Juan," and "Die Zauberflöte" ("The Magic Flute"), the "new mechanical comedy," as it was called, probably because of the mechanical effects introduced. The philosophical and Masonic references in this last-named opera are spoken of, and all the characters are, as in the other operas, minutely analysed. On Beethoven's only opera, "Fidelio," he dwells with pardonable fondness; but if he finds no great dramatic advance in the poem or in the music, he discovers it in Weber's "Der Freischütz," in "Euryanthe," and in "Oberon." The second volume is taken up by a short account of Meyerbeer, which occupies some thirty pages or so, and a long account of Wagner, to which some three hundred pages are devoted. The account of Meyerbeer, though proportionately of less dimensions than his admirers would hold to be commensurate with his deserts, is fair and impartial. The writer has reserved all his strength for the description of the author of "Rienzi," "Der Fliegende Holländer," "Tannhäuser," "Lohengrin," "Tristan und Isolde," "Die Meistersinger von Nürnberg," "Der Ring des Nibelungen," and "Parsifal," the latter of which he says, in spite of the merits of others, remains Wagner's last and greatest work. "Believing minds will say that it was the contemplation of the world from the lofty standpoint of the stars. It is a work of hope and presentiment. The blood which glows in the Graal chalice, illuminates and purifies that hope, vivifies the presentiment, and separates the mortal from the immortal. It is the crowning point of his career and of the phase of art he represented so ably. The building in Bayreuth where his dramas are given rises up as a monument of his desires and his aims. He attained as an artist more than most men during his lifetime by his works, and if upon that hill not one stone shall stand upon another, his spirit will live in his art creations. He will rank in the records of mankind as great as the immortals."

This concluding sentence is the key to the whole work, and is a fair evidence of the spirit in which the record has been made. Without questioning the right of Wagner to occupy a high position in art, there are few who will think that all those who prepared the way for him and worked honestly according to their lights were not of equal importance with him as factors in the development of the dramaturgy of the opera.

Sing to me. Duet for Soprano and Tenor. Music composed by Rosalind F. Ellicott. [Novello, Ewer and Co.]

THE words of this duet, by R. S. Hichens, are well written, and serve as the vehicle for a truly elegant musical idea. Miss Ellicott has a special gift of melody, and writes for voices so as to give them the best opportunities for effective display. The duet is altogether an excellent piece of writing, and should become very popular with vocalists.

Three Children's Cantatas. Cinderella, Beauty and the Beast, and Lamplblack. By Myles Birket Foster.

[Weekes and Co.]

THESE three Cantatas were written and composed for the Keighley Schools, but they are equally available for like purposes in other localities. The lines which once defined the boundaries of school teaching have been broken down in places where non-sectarian teaching prevails, and a greater field for the practical use of subjects taught to children has been opened. The hymn tune, or the simple song, no longer satisfies the demands of school teachers. Cantatas to sacred or secular words are in great request. Without entering into the question as to whether these things are of the value claimed for them, or whether the time taken up for their study and acquirement is of any considerable advantage among the multitude of subjects taught to children, it will be enough to say that those who approve of the use of Cantatas for young folk cannot do better than make acquaintance with these works of Mr. Foster. His music is pretty and ear-catching, and the treatment and accompaniments exhibit much artistic taste.

Ruth. A Dramatic Oratorio. By F. H. Cowen. Tonic Sol-fa Edition. [Novello, Ewer and Co.]

THERE is no need to describe this latest work from the pen and brain of one of the most popular of our English musicians. It is only necessary to call attention to the fact that it has been translated into Tonic Sol-fa notation for the benefit of those who prefer that method to the more general manner of writing and printing music. This special edition, which has been prepared by the skilled hand of Mr. W. G. McNaught, will introduce the Oratorio to a number of new admirers.

Services of Song. [Novello, Ewer and Co.]

MESSRS. NOVELLO's series of Services of Sacred Song, edited by Dr. Troutbeck, has recently been enlarged by the addition of two services on New Testament subjects, one by the Rev. H. Aldrich Cotton, Minor Canon of Westminster, on "St. John the Evangelist," the other by the Rev. E. Price, who is a member of the same body, on "St. John the Baptist."

Both the new Services of Song, especially that on "St. John the Evangelist," appear to have been compiled with care, discrimination, and completeness; and to be, like their predecessors in the series, types of what those who like and use such services would desire. They will, moreover, we think, go far to reconcile to their use those who are as yet averse to Services of Song. For convenience they are divided into several scenes or parts, like the others in the series, in such a manner that the whole of each service, should it be found too long, need not necessarily be gone through at one time. The hymns are excellently chosen, and are chiefly set to tunes selected from the Hymnary.

Mr. Cotton, we notice, has introduced several Anthems as alternatives, should the powers of the choirs engaged warrant their introduction. We are glad to remark that these new services have appeared at so suitable a time of the year. It is unnecessary to add that the letterpress and music are models of clear printing.

Magnificat and Nunc dimittis, set to music in the key of E flat. By F. Kilvington Hattersley.

[Novello, Ewer and Co.]

THE composer of this setting of the Magnificat and Nunc dimittis will be remembered as the author of a spirited Overture which was performed at the last Leeds Festival. He is one among many of the musicians of Yorkshire who are striving to prove themselves worthy of the art they profess. His music in this case is melodious and effective, but it is less original either in design or treatment than might have been expected from his former work. He has not disdained taking a hint from Dr. Martin's treatment of the Magnificat in harmonising for voices a melody previously heard as a solo. Young composers will follow a model for a time. It is the preliminary condition of those who would gain strength to be able to assert their independence. There is, however, much that shows earnestness of purpose and promise of goodness in the music before us.

FOREIGN NOTES.

THE new building of the Leipzig Conservatorium was inaugurated with appropriate ceremonies on the 5th ult., the musical proceedings including the performance of Beethoven's Overture "Zur Weihe des Hauses," Mendelssohn's 98th Psalm, and Weber's "Jubel" Overture. The noble concert-hall, in which the inauguration took place, is admitted on all hands to be an admirably designed structure, and most satisfactory in its acoustical properties.

In connection with the above event, the Leipzig University has conferred the title of Doctor of Philosophy, honoris causa, upon Herr S. Jadassohn, the veteran composer and professor at the Conservatorium.

At a Concert of the Hamburg Philharmonic Society last month a Symphony in D minor, by Prince Henry of Reuss-Koestritz, was performed, for the first time, under the direction of its august composer. The work is characterised in German papers as a most musicianlike production.

The annual music Festival of the Lower Rhine will take place this year (in Whitsun week) at Aix-la-Chapelle, when the following works will be included in the programme: "Messiah" (Handel); a Cantata (Bach); Symphony in B (Beethoven); Overtures, "Euryanthe" (Weber); "Manfred" (Schumann); and "Zur Weihe des Hauses" (Beethoven); and the new double Concerto by J. Brahms. Hans Richter will be the Conductor.

Weber's posthumous (fragmentary) Opera "Die drei Pintos," as completed by Herr Mahler, is to be produced for the first time on the 20th inst., at Leipzig, and will doubtless make the round of German theatres, those of Berlin, Hamburg, and Dresden being likewise already engaged upon mounting the interesting novelty. The score of the "Pintos" will shortly be published by the firm of C. F. Kahnt, of Leipzig.

A new Symphony by Herr Goldmark was performed for the first time last month, at Dresden, under the direction of Capellmeister Schuch, and met with a highly favourable reception.

Spohr's "Jessonda" was revived on the 4th ult., at the Leipzig Stadt-Theater, with a brilliant mise-en-scène, and was well received.

Messrs. Gilbert and Sullivan's Operetta, "H.M.S. Pinafore," is just now being performed to full houses at the Krollsohe Theatre of Berlin.

In memory of the late Madame Lind-Goldschmidt, a series of operas associated with the brilliant operatic career of the "Swedish Nightingale," and accompanied by appropriate tableaux and recitations, has just been given at the Stockholm Opera-house. The performances commenced on November 29, on which day, fifty-seven years ago, Jenny Lind, then only ten years of age, made her first appearance in the theatrical world.

A monument is to be erected in his native town of Zittau, to Heinrich Marschner, the composer of "Der Templer und die Jüdin."

Madame Pauline Lucca, the well-known prima donna, is about to establish a vocal academy in the Austrian capital, where she has resided for many years past.

Bizet's early opera "Les Pêcheurs des Perles" was produced for the first time at the Théâtre de la Monnaie, of Brussels, recently, and was well received, the performance, moreover, having been an excellent one.

M. Lamoureux continues to cultivate Wagner's music at his weekly Concerts in the French capital. Thus, on November 27 the programme included the "Parsifal" Prelude, and extracts from "Die Meistersinger," all of which were most enthusiastically applauded.

Madame Patti made a public re-appearance in Paris, on the 9th ult., for the first time since the war. The occasion was a Concert given at the Opéra Comique in aid of the funds of the French Hospital in London.

Schumann's "Paradise and the Peri" was included in one of M. Colonne's recent Concerts at the Paris Châtelet, this having been the first performance of the work in France.

Victorin Joncières, the composer of "Le Chevalier Jean," has completed a new opera, "King Lear," the libretto founded upon Shakespeare's tragedy.

Liszt's Oratorio "Christus" is about to be performed for the first time at Prague, by the "Hlahol" Choral Society of that town.

Mdlle. Marie van Zandt, the former diva of the Paris Opéra Comique, has made her début in the Concert-room at Vienna, where she has been enthusiastically received. The gifted artist is said to have accepted a permanent engagement at the Imperial Opera.

An opera by Herr Langer, entitled "Murillo," recently brought out at the Stadt-Theater of Mannheim, is considered one of the successes of the current German Opera season.

Antonin Dvorák's "Symphonic Variations," recently introduced for the first time at a Philharmonic Concert at Vienna, under Hans Richter, met with a highly appreciative audience, and are much praised by Herr Hanslick in the Viennese Neue Freie Presse.

Tschaikowski's new opera, "The Enchantress," has achieved an unqualified success at the Imperial Opera of St. Petersburg.

Anton Rubinstein is just now engaged upon the composition of a sacred work intended for stage performance, entitled "Moses," and for which he has invented the novel designation of "Operatic Oratorio."

M. Massenet's opera, "Le Cid," has met with but moderate success on the occasion of its recent first performance at the Imperial Opera of Vienna.

Verdi's "Otello" is to be performed, for the first time, at the Royal Opera of Munich, on the 22nd inst., when a distinguished audience from all parts of Germany and abroad are expected to assist.

A prize of 500 lire having been offered some time since by the Cercolo Artistico, of Turin, for the setting in music of an operatic libretto, "Una Tazza di Thé," no less than seventy-three competitors have sent in their compositions.

An opera, "Cymbelina," by the Maëstro Van Westerhout, of Naples, has recently been performed in that town, before a select audience of connoisseurs, by whom it was much applauded. The libretto is founded upon Shakespeare's play, the author being Signor Golisciani.

At the Metropolitan Opera House of New York Wagner's "Siegfried," the third part of the famous Tetralogy, was produced for the first time in November last, and met with a most enthusiastic reception, the Musical Courier summing up the event as "a big success."

Under the title of "How Richard Wagner became a composer" a dramatised version of some incidents related in Wagner's autobiographical sketch has been published at Prague, from the pen of a Mr. H. Von Zimmermann.

Messrs. Breitkopf and Härtel have published, in two volumes, the highly interesting letters exchanged at different periods between Richard Wagner and Franz Liszt. The correspondence in question forms an important contribution to the history of the "Kunstwerk der Zukunft," while illustrating anew the almost unique friendship existing between the two masters.

A new Beethoven biography, from the pen of Herr W. J. von Wasielewski, has just been published by the firm of Brachvogel and Ranft, in Berlin.

The sketch of a drama entitled "Jesus von Nazareth," from the pen of Richard Wagner, found among posthumous papers of the master, has just been published by Messrs. Breitkopf and Härtel. It emanates from the revolutionary period of 1848, when the poet-composer was in his thirty-sixth year.

A new music journal, the Berliner Signale, has been started at Berlin, under the editorship of Herr Henry Klein.

Ugo Capetti, a distinguished musical critic, and advocate of Wagnerian art principles, died at Milan, on November 15, aged forty-four.

The once famous violin virtuoso, Miska Hauser, died at Vienna, on the 9th ult., aged sixty-six. He was a Hungarian by birth, and as a boy of twelve made the tour of the world, the experiences whereof he has related in a volume entitled "Wanderbuch eines oesterreichischen Virtuosen."

Eduard Marxsen, a composer of merit, and a very efficient pianist and teacher of that instrument, died, at Hamburg, on November 18, aged eighty-one. He was the early instructor of Johannes Brahms.

The death is announced, at Hamburg, of Theodor Michaelis, a composer of orchestral music, whose "Turkish Patrol" made the tour of the world some years since. He was born at Altona, in 1831.

CORRESPONDENCE.

Owing to pressure of matter we are compelled to omit the greater part of the Correspondence this month.

SINKING IN PITCH.

TO THE EDITOR OF "THE MUSICAL TIMES."

SIR,—With reference to Mr. Bret Miller's letter, published in THE MUSICAL TIMES of this month, deploring the habit of church choirs falling in pitch whilst monotoning and singing, I venture to offer a few remarks in the hope that they may perhaps prove useful as a means of remedying the evil of which he complains.

I do not believe ladies to be more capable of preserving their pitch than males. The habit of maintaining a true reciting-note throughout is acquired by the careful musical cultivation of the ear; and there is no reason to believe that females are more perfect in this respect than males.

Church choirs as a rule depend too much upon the instruments which accompany them both in services and at practices. The choristers are consequently not taught to rely upon themselves. The organ becomes a necessity rather than a help to them. When deprived of it, the choir sings out of tune, owing to the ear not being accustomed to rely upon itself.

The choir of which for eighteen months I have had charge is composed entirely of men, who are accustomed to sing in harmony without any instrument whatever, either in church or at practice, except where it is positively necessary. The result is that they go through a whole hymn or part-song unaccompanied without falling. They are taught and become accustomed to rely solely on their ear for the tunefulness of their sounds; flatness, consequently, is almost unknown among us.

I believe if choirmasters were to use their organs less frequently at practices, the malady of which Mr. Miller complains would be cured.—Yours truly,

A CHOIRMASTER.

OLD ORGANISTS.

TO THE EDITOR OF "THE MUSICAL TIMES."

SIR,—I noticed in your Obituary columns this month what you say about the long service of sixty-four years as organist; but the following very remarkable epitaph can be seen in All Saints' Churchyard, Hertford:—

"To the memory of Charles Bridgeman, born August 20, 1778, died August 3, 1873. For eighty-one years organist of this parish. A tribute of affection and respect."

Yours truly,

JOSHUA D. HORWOOD.

37, Peel Street, Hull, December 12, 1887.

TO CORRESPONDENTS.

 Notices of concerts, and other information supplied by our friends in the country, must be forwarded as early as possible after the occurrence; otherwise they cannot be inserted. Our correspondents must specifically denote the date of each concert, for without such date no notice can be taken of the performance.

Our correspondents will oblige by writing all names as clearly as possible, as we cannot be responsible for any mistakes that may occur.

Correspondents are informed that their names and addresses must accompany all communications.

We cannot undertake to return offered contributions; the authors, therefore, will do well to retain copies.

Notice is sent to all subscribers whose payment (in advance) is exhausted. The paper will be discontinued where the Subscription is not renewed. We again remind those who are disappointed in obtaining back numbers that, although the music is always kept in stock, only a sufficient quantity of the rest of the paper is printed to supply the current sale.

A DISTRESSED ORGANIST.—Thanks. Letter too long.

H. G. F. (KILKENNY).—We are much obliged for your able and interesting letter, but regret that we are unable to avail ourselves of its contents.

M. S. M.—The English concertina was invented by Sir Charles Wheatstone, and patented by him June 19, 1829.

MUSICUS.—Adelina Patti was born in Madrid, November 10, 1843.

BRIEF SUMMARY OF COUNTRY NEWS.

We do not hold ourselves responsible for any opinions expressed in this Summary, as all the notices are either collated from the local papers or supplied to us by correspondents.

ASHFORD, KENT.—The members of St. Mary's Choir, assisted by the Amateur Orchestral Society, gave their annual Concert on the 15th ult. The music selected was Barnett's Ancient Mariner and Cowen's Rose Maiden, which were well rendered by the choir and orchestra, and reflected the greatest credit upon their talented Conductor, Dr. Wilks. The orchestral effects in the Ancient Mariner were well brought out. The solos were taken by members of the choir, Masters Dyson, Tabor, Carter, Burnage, and Messrs. Hardy, Richardson, Hudson, and Meacher. The choir and orchestra combined numbered 150.

ASHTON-UNDER-LYNE.—Mr. W. Byrom gave a Recital of Chamber Music at the Co-operative Hall. The programme comprised examples of Mozart, Weber, Schumann, and Beethoven, interpreted by Mr. Lalande (oboe), Mr. Wadsworth (clarinet), Mr. Campbell (horn), Mr. Fotheringham (bassoon), and Mr. Byrom (pianoforte). Miss Eaton sang "The Eve of Day" (Lachner), with horn obbligato, and later a song by Macfarren, "Pack clouds away," with clarinet obbligato. Mr. Byrom played the pianoforte accompaniments.

BECKENHAM.—The Beckenham Vocal Union gave their second annual Concert on the 30th ult. at the Public Hall. The work chosen was Gaul's tuneful Cantata The Holy City, the solos being entrusted to the able hands of Miss Isabel Devitt, Miss Annie Buckland, Mr. Henry Yates, and Mr. Walter Wells, all of whom distinguished themselves in their respective parts. The choruses were very effectively sung. Part two opened with a violin solo—Adagio, E minor Concerto (Mendelssohn)—played by Miss Madeleine Johnson. Miss Buckland sang Sullivan's "Lost Chord," and Mr. Walter Wells "Why do the nations?" The last item on the programme was Handel's Zadok the Priest, given in a spirited manner by the chorus. The Conductor was Mr. T. Waldo Morell. There was a competent orchestra, and Mr. F. S. Newcombe presided at the organ with his usual skill.

BEDDINGTON, SURREY.—At the large and very handsome church of which this village is fortunate enough to possess, a performance of Spohr's Last Judgment took place on the 15th ult. The work was rendered by the local choir of about thirty voices, without any extraneous help whatever, except that Mr. W. A. Frost, of St. Paul's Cathedral, was engaged to sing the alto part in the four quartets. The whole performance did great credit to the choir and organist, Mr. G. C. Burry, who presided at the organ. The Oratorio was preceded and followed by the same psalms and prayers as are used at the similar service in St. Paul's.

BIGGLESWADE, BEDS.—On the 13th ult. Mr. Frank Amor gave a Violin Recital to the pupils at Mead House School, and was deservedly encoered for his rendering of the D minor Concerto (Spohr) and the Concerto of Mendelssohn. His masterly execution was further displayed in some Scotch airs with variations, which he also performed, and elicited loud applause.—An Organ Recital was given on Saturday afternoon, the 17th ult., in St. Andrew's Church, by Mr. William Stuart. Pieces were played from the works of Handel, Henselt, Dubois, Batiste, Lemmens, Morandi, and Smart, which were finely executed. A collection was made in aid of the new organ fund.

BISHOP'S STORTFORD.—The Choral Society, which was inaugurated a few months ago, gave its first public performance on the 6th ult., in the Large Hall. The work selected was Mendelssohn's 42nd Psalm. Miss Agnes Larkcom took the solos, which were well received. The second part of the programme was of a miscellaneous description, Miss Agnes Larkcom and Mr. E. Dalzell were very successful in their respective songs. Mr. Halfpenny played two violin solos in his well-known style, being accompanied by Mr. F. J. W. Williams, who also conducted.

BLACKBURN.—The St. Cecilia Society opened their season on the 12th ult. with a performance of Judas Maccabæus. The solos were sustained by Miss Annie Marriott, Miss Norton, Miss Harris, Mr. Harper Kearton, and Mr. D. Sutton Shepley. There was an excellent band selected from Mr. Charles Hallé's orchestra, and the Conductor was Mr. James H. Rooks (Manningham). A word of praise is also due to the chorus for the precision with which they sang.

BOURNEMOUTH.—A morning Concert was given, on the 14th ult., at the New Town Hall. Miss Hope Glenn and Mr. Charles Kingsley were the vocalists, and the Chevalier L. Emil Bach, solo pianist. There was an orchestra of forty performers, conducted by Signor G. D. La Camera. Compositions by Haydn, Beethoven, Liszt, L. E. Bach, and others, were performed to the satisfaction of the audience present. At the evening Concert, on the same day, a programme of a more popular character was presented.

BRIDGE OF ALLAN.—In the Macfarlane Museum Hall, on the 16th ult., the Choral Society gave their first Concert this season. The first part of the programme was taken up with Gade's Cantata The Erl-King's Daughter. Mr. Erskine conducted. The solos were sung by Mrs. W. B. Pular, Miss Jessie Hunter, and Mr. Gideon Duncan. The chorus sang well, the Epilogue being especially fine. Miss Morrison at the piano, and Mr. W. J. Hutchins at the harmonium, supplied the instrumental music, and both played well. Mr. Erskine wielded the bâton to good effect. The second part of the programme included a trio, some solos, and part-songs.

BRIGG.—Handel's Messiah was given by Mr. Cray's Choral Society, on the 20th ult. The band and chorus numbered 120, and the soloists were Miss Kate Fusselle, Miss Morris, Mr. Dunkerton, and Mr. McColl; the leader of the band being Mr. Winter, leader of the Hull Harmonic Society's band. The Concert was a great success. Mr. Cray conducted.

BROADSTAIRS.—An Organ Recital was given in the Church of Holy Trinity on the 6th ult., by Mr. W. H. Higgins, who played Bach's Fugue in G minor, Sir W. Sterndale Bennett's Barcarole, and other pieces. The vocalist was Mr. J. Higgins, of Canterbury.

BURNLEY.—Mr. J. E. Gaul, Organist of St. Matthews, gave a Pianoforte Recital on November 29.—On November 30, The Lay of the Bell was rendered in Brunswick School with an augmented chorus and small band. Master and Miss Homer were the soloists, and Mr. T. Pollard conducted.—The first of a series of short Recitals was sung by the Choir in St. James's Church after Evensong, on the 4th ult.—The Vocal Union gave their first Concert this season in the Opera House, on the 14th ult. The Revenge, the Rosamunde Overture, and Ballads formed the first part, Mr. Seymour Jackson being recalled for a tasteful rendering of "An autumn wind" (Cruikshank). Mackenzie's Bride was included in the second part, Miss Bertha Moore and Mr. Jackson being the principals, who, with Mr. Barrington Foote, were well received by an appreciative audience. Mr. Myers ably accompanied, and Mr. W. A. C. Cruikshank, Mus. Bac., Oxon., conducted.—The Ladies' Literary Association closed their season with a Musical Soirée on the 16th ult., under the special patronage of Mrs. Greenwood, Tarleton House. Miss Greenwood and Miss Shepherd played duets, Miss Cruikshank sang songs by Schumann and Macicere. Schubert's Ave Maria was contributed by Miss Thompson, other vocal numbers by Miss Law, and piano solos by Miss Hartley and Miss Charlotte Simpson.

BURY ST. EDMUNDS.—The Choral Society commenced the season by a performance of Handel's Messiah on the 13th ult., the large Athenæum Hall being crowded. The choruses were sung with great spirit. The solos were rendered by Miss Julia Jones, Miss A. E. Snape, Mr. Holberry Hagyard, and Mr. J. H. Brockbank. The band and chorus numbered about 130. Mr. T. B. Richardson was the Conductor.

CALNE, WILTS.—The members of the Parish Church Choir gave a most successful Concert at the Town Hall on the 5th ult. The soloists were Mrs. J. B. O. Angell, Miss Rich, Miss Buchanan, Miss Plenderleath, Rev. Canon Rich, and Herr Berndt. Some part-songs were rendered with much precision. Conductor, Mr. Pulein. The violin playing of Herr Berndt was enthusiastically received by the audience.

CAMBRIDGE.—An Organ Recital was given on the 1st ult., at the Guildhall, in the presence of the Mayor and a distinguished circle, by Mr. F. Dewberry, Mus. B., F.C.O., Borough Organist. The programme selected was from works by Mendelssohn, Bach, Handel, Guilman, and N. W. H. McLean. Some excellent part-songs were well rendered by the choir. The soloist was Miss Bertha Ball, who sang "Jerusalem." Mr. W. C. Dewberry, Mus. B., presided at the pianoforte.

CLAY CROSS.—The first Concert this season of the Clay Cross Musical Association was given on the 14th ult., when a large audience assembled. Sterndale Bennett's May Queen was sung, together with a miscellaneous second part. The principal vocalists were Miss Winnie Beaumont, Miss Chadwick, Mr. E. Bodger, and Mr. T. Mackie. The Concert was very successful in every way, and gave great satisfaction. Mr. Newbould conducted; Miss Basset was at the piano, and Mr. Butterworth at the organ.

CLEVEDON.—The members of the Clevedon Choral Society gave their usual Winter Concert on the 13th ult. The works performed were Gaul's Holy City and Mendelssohn's Athalie. The solos were undertaken by members of the Society, who deserve great credit for their efforts. Mr. J. Pomeroy, of Clifton, contributed a violoncello solo. Mr. F. Gardner led a small but very efficient band, and Mr. W. Haydn Cox, of Bristol, conducted.

CRICK.—On Thursday, the 1st ult., a Concert was given before a large audience. The vocalists were Miss Hearnden, Miss Donnelly, Miss Stocks, Miss Curzon, Mr. Melrose, Mr. Bestwick, and Masters Banks and Thompson, two of Mr. Windle's choir boys. Solo violin, Mr. Richards: pianist and Conductor, Mr. W. W. Windle, of Belper, who played duets and trios with his pupils, Miss Fisher, Miss Hearnden, Miss Lee, Miss Glossop, and Mr. E. Glossop.

CRICKLEWOOD.—An enjoyable Concert was given in St. Peter's Schoolroom on the 13th ult., by Mrs. Albert Rayment. She was assisted by Madame Annie Williams, Mr. Cundy, and Mr. Albert Rayment; Miss Mackness (pianoforte), Mr. Buckley (violin), and Mr. A. A. Yeatman (accompanist), all of whom ably sustained their parts.

DORCHESTER.—The Vocal Association gave a grand performance of Haydn's Creation at the Corn Exchange, on the 15th ult., before a large audience. The principal vocalists were Miss Marie Gane, Mr. Wm. Durden, and Mr. Fred. Dison. The band and chorus were efficient, under the conductorship of Mr. Boyton Smith.

DOVER.—The opening of the organ of the Dover College Chapel, after rebuilding, additions, &c., was celebrated by a Special Service on the 12th ult. Wesley's Anthem, "Blessed be the God and Father," and a selection of carols by Barnby, Sullivan, and others, were sung by the choir, under the direction of the Rev. A. H. Stevens, M.A., Mus. Bac., Organist and Precentor, who also exhibited the qualities of the instrument to the most favourable advantage.

DUDLEY.—The Vocal Union gave a performance (for the first time in Dudley) of Weber's Jubilee Cantata, in the Public Hall, on the 6th ult. The principal vocalists were Miss Catherine Penna, Mr. Harry Moberley, and Mr. G. H. Mainwaring, who were supported by an efficient band and chorus of 100 performers. The Cantata was successfully given, and with the miscellaneous selection which followed was greatly enjoyed. Mr. W. H. Aston was solo pianist and accompanist, and Mr. B. Barlow, Conductor.

EASTBOURNE.—Miss Janet Steele's Concert took place on the 8th ult., at the Town Hall. The artists were Miss Janet Steele, Miss Frances Hipwell, Mr. John Probert, Mr. E. Mill, Miss Nellie Chaplin (pianist), and Miss Kate Chaplin (violinist), while Mr. E. Watts Russell assisted with some recitations. Miss Steele has a voice of good compass and considerable strength and sweetness, qualities which were particularly observable in her rendering of her songs. The Misses Chaplin showed talent and gained much applause. Mr. Probert and Miss Hipwell were equally successful.

ELLAND, YORKS.—The Choral Society gave a performance of St. Paul, on the 13th ult., in the presence of a large audience. The solo vocalists were Miss Winnie Beaumont, Mr. Henry Beaumont, Mr. Gledhill Marsden, and Mr. Sutton Shepley. Mr. James Noble conducted, and Mr. Worton presided at the organ.

ELLESMERE, SALOP.—A Concert took place in the Town Hall, on the 16th ult. Gaul's new Cantata Joan of Arc was given by the members of the Ellesmere Choral Union. The soloists were Miss Lilian Mills, Mr. H. Bydlin, and Mr. E. Robinson. A small orchestra was led by Mr. P. Powell; Miss C. Thomas presided at the pianoforte, and Mr. A. Hood at the harmonium. The choruses were well rendered by the choir, especially No. II, "On, to the battle, on." The second part of the Concert was miscellaneous. Mr. Arthur T. Akeroyd was the Conductor.

FAKENHAM, NORFOLK.—Mr. Loraine Holloway gave two Organ Recitals at the Parish Church, on Wednesday, the 25th ult. The programmes, which included selections from Bach, Handel, Mendelssohn, Guilman, Lemmens, Smart, Stewart, Mackenzie, Calkin, Sterndale Bennett, and Bunnett, were ably rendered. At each Recital Christmas Carols were well given by the choir.

FROME.—Handel's Messiah was performed in the Wesleyan Chapel on November 24, with a band and chorus of 100 performers. The chief vocalists were Mrs. Eames, Miss Bradbury, Mr. E. T. Morgan, of Bristol Cathedral, Mr. H. Welham, and Mr. E. R. Trotman. The Organist was Mr. F. Derry, and the Conductor, Mr. T. Grant.

GOSPORT.—The first of the present season of Monday Popular Concerts was given in the Thorngate Hall on the 12th ult. Miss Lillian Egerton and Mr. Seymour Kelly were the vocalists, the latter receiving an encore for his rendering of Calcott's "Friend of the brave," with orchestral accompaniment. The orchestra was composed of the splendid band of the Royal Marine Light Infantry, conducted by Mr. George Miller, and Mr. H. Harvey Pincher was an able accompanist.

GRAVESEND.—On Friday evening, the 9th ult., Mr. G. R. Ceiley performed on the organ of the Parish Church, in aid of the Choir Fund, a selection of pieces by Batiste, Smart, Mendelssohn, Wely, Bordesi, Rossini, and Bunnett. Messrs. Ceiley and George Clinch were the vocalists.

GRIMSBY.—The first Concert of the season by the Grimsby Philharmonic Society was given in the Town Hall on the 13th ult. The principal artists were Miss Agnese A. Macfarlane, Miss Morris, Mr. Musgrove Tufnail, Mr. R. R. Coverdale (solo violin); accompanist, Mr. Wm. Bennett. The band (from Hull, Grimsby, &c.) consisted of twenty performers. Mr. Walter Porter, of Hull, was Conductor. The programme included "Hear my prayer" (Mendelssohn), and a miscellaneous selection.

HARROW.—A very successful Pianoforte Recital was given in the Public Hall, on the 1st ult., by Miss Gurney (pupil of Mr. Franklin Taylor). The programme was selected from the works of Chopin, Bach, Henselt, Kirchner, Liszt, and Weber. The various items were excellently rendered and warmly received by a good audience. Miss Annie Marriott was the vocalist; Herr Peiniger, violinist; and Mr. Hopkins Ould, accompanist.

HARTLEPOOL.—The Hartlepool Choral Society gave a performance of Mendelssohn's St. Paul, on Monday, the 19th ult., before a large and appreciative audience. The band and chorus numbered 100 performers. The principal vocalists were Miss Lily Marshall-Ward, Miss Wilmot, Mr. Acott, and Mr. W. R. Cheesman. The orchestra was composed of the principal amateur instrumentalists of the district, led by Mr. A. Trechmann; Mr. J. H. Robson presiding at the harmonium. The choruses were rendered with precision. Mr. Watson Hunter conducted.

HEBDEN BRIDGE.—The Harmonic Society gave their annual performance of The Messiah on the 20th ult., under the conductorship of Mr. W. R. Eckersley. The vocalists were Miss Conway, Miss Bertenshaw, Mr. C. W. Fredericks, and Mr. D. Sutton Shepley.

HIGHER ARDWICK.—A Concert in aid of the Higher Ardwick Orchestral Society, was given in the Lecture Hall, on the 3rd ult. The following vocalists kindly gave their services—Miss M. Hickey, Miss M. Walsley, Mr. W. R. Parkin, and Mr. F. McKenna. Mr. J. Heywood played a violin solo, and Mr. W. H. Maggs a flute solo, each of which was very heartily received. Mr. D. Beckley gave Sullivan's "Lost Chord" as a cornet solo. The band, under the conductorship of Mr. W. Pearson, played some pieces which were well received. Miss M. A. Hickey was the accompanist.

HITCHIN.—The Choral Society gave an excellent rendering of selections from Haydn's Creation, in the Town Hall, on the evening of the 14th ult. Mr. W. Carling, Mus. Bac., Oxon., conducted. The soloists were Miss Clark, Mr. Blandford, and Mr. Johnson. The orchestra, reinforced by Mr. Halpenny (violin), Mr. Woolhouse (violinello), and Mr. Reynolds (double-bass), acquitted themselves remarkably well. In the second part of the Concert, which was miscellaneous, Messrs. Woolhouse and Reynolds delighted the audience by brilliant solos on their respective instruments, whilst Miss Clark, Mr. Johnson, and others gave highly effective songs, which were much appreciated.

HOVE.—Miss Ethel Savery (from the Royal Conservatoire of Music, Leipzig) gave a Concert at the Town Hall on the 16th ult., assisted by Miss Maude Bond, Miss Nellie Reed, Miss Evelyn Gates, Miss Alice Gomes, Miss Amy Sedgwick, Mr. T. H. Bred, and Mr. Marten Rarling. Miss Savery's playing was much admired. Mr. Norman Roe acted as accompanist, Dr. Sawyer as Conductor.

HUNGERFORD, BERKS.—The Choral Society, conducted by Mr. J. T. Liddle, Mus. Bac., gave an excellent performance of Gaul's Holy City, in the Corn Exchange, on the 21st ult. An orchestra of ladies and gentlemen, principally from Newbury, ably led by Mr. James Brown, gave most efficient assistance, and the harp accompaniments were played by Mr. A. Putnam. The solos were taken by Miss Mary Appach and Miss Rosa Hatt, and by Messrs. Hawkins and J. Stuart Higgs. In the miscellaneous selection forming the second part, Mr. J. Brown gave a violin solo, and joined Mr. Liddle in Spohr's Andante and Finale in D minor, and Messrs. Liddle, Brown, and Guyard, and Miss Gibb played the Andante Finale from a Concerto for four violins, by Maurer. Miss Appach, Miss Hatt, and Mr. Stuart Higgs sang solos, and the choir gave some part-songs most effectively.

HYDE, NEAR MANCHESTER.—The Philharmonic Society gave a miscellaneous Concert on the 1st ult., which was in every way successful. Handel's Oratorio The Messiah was also given on the 22nd, with considerable success. The leading vocalists were Miss Mason, Miss Twidale, Mr. F. Clarke, and Mr. Hugh Ashton. The band was effective and the chorus good. Mr. Jos. Brierley conducted, and Mr. James E. Wood was Organist.

JERSEY.—Two very successful Concerts were given by the Choral Society on Wednesday and Thursday evenings, the 14th and 15th ult., at the Oddfellows' Hall, when Handel's Judas Maccabæus was admirably performed to crowded audiences. The solo vocalists were Miss Marianne Fenna, Miss Clara Rothwell, Mr. Edwin Morgan, and Mr. Thomas Kempton. The rendering of the choruses testified to the care with which the voices had been trained by Mr. E. Dowden, the Conductor of the Society. Messrs. C. E. R. Stevens and J. Malzard presided at the pianoforte, and Mr. J. Mallet at the organ. There was also a very effective string band.

LEAMINGTON.—The Leamington College Choral Society gave two performances of Farmer's Oratorio Christ and His Soldiers, on the evenings of Sundays, the 11th and 13th ult. These performances, the first of the Society, passed off successfully. Mr. O. O. Brooksbank, the College Organist, presided at the organ. The orchestra was recruited from the College students.

LEICESTER.—The second Popular Concert (second series) given by the Temperance Society, under the direction of Mr. J. A. Adcock, took place on the 3rd ult. Miss Maude Harding, Mr. T. W. Page, and the Leicester Vocal Octet supplied the vocal items. M. Sichel, solo violin; Messrs. Goddard, Bell, Engleman, and Harman, The Birmingham Trombone Quartet, with a full band of 120 performers, supplied the instrumental items. Miss Newton and Mr. J. Garner acted as accompanists. The first of the sixth series of Mr. Harvey Löhr's Chamber Concerts took place on the 8th ult., at the Temperance Hall. The principal items of the programme were Mozart's Sonata in E flat, for pianoforte and violin, and Mendelssohn's Variations in D, for pianoforte and violoncello. The performers were Miss Winnifred Robinson, a young English artist of high attainments; Mr. Whitehouse, violoncello; and Mr. Harvey Löhr, whose rendering of Bach's Chromatic Fantasia was classical, without exaggeration. The Trio of Rubinstein's was a welcome novelty. Mr. Nicholl, who made his first appearance in Leicester, possesses a sympathetic voice and an artistic and musically style. The audience recalled him after Schubert's "Serenade."

LINCOLN.—On the 15th ult., the Harmonic Society gave a performance of the Bride of Dunkerton, under the conductorship of Mr. F. Marshall Ward. The vocalists were Miss Bertha Moore, Mr. E. Dunkerton, and Mr. D. Sutton Shepley.

LLANELLY.—The fifth annual Concert of Mr. A. W. Swindell's Pupils was held at the Athenæum Hall, on Monday, the 19th ult. The programme was faithfully gone through, and reflected a great deal of credit on all who took part.

LONDONDERRY.—A performance of Pattison's Lay of the Last Minstrel was given here, by the Carlisle Road Choir, on the 5th ult., before a crowded and appreciative audience.

LYTHAM.—On the 13th ult., the Choral Union gave the first Concert of the season in the Baths Assembly Room. The programme included Macfarren's Cantata May Day, solos by Madame Emilie Clarke. A miscellaneous selection followed, in which Mr. Frank Weston (violin), Mr. Blacow, and Madame Clarke took part. The Cantata was admirably given. The choruses and part-songs by the members of the Choral Union were listened to with the closest attention, and elicited very great and well deserved applause. Mr. W. F. Holden conducted, and Miss Fell accompanied.

MACCLESFIELD.—At the second Concert of the season, by the Philharmonic Society, on the 7th ult., in the large Sunday School, Handel's Oratorio Samson was given. The principals were Miss Fanny Bristowe, Miss Florence Bourne, Mr. E. Kemp, and Mr. E. Jackson. Mr. Hawkins conducted, as usual, and Mr. J. W. Jackson presided at the organ.

MALTA.—The annual Festival of the Naval Church Society was held on St. Andrew's Day, in the Barracca Military Chapel, Valetta. The musical part of the service was rendered by the choir of H.M. Ship Alexandra, directed by Mr. Leese, R.N., schoolmaster, and reflected great credit on the bluejackets and their instructor, the chanting of the special Psalm, sung to a Gregorian chant, being especially good. The tuneful setting of the Magnificat and Nunc dimittis, composed for the occasion by the Rev. C. J. Corfe, was also very well sung. The choir of the Collegiate Church of St. Paul gave their first Concert on the 16th ult., in the Military Gymnasium, in aid of the Cambridge Asylum for the Widows and Orphans of Soldiers. An appreciative audience assembled to hear a very enjoyable miscellaneous programme, which was rendered in a very creditable manner, under the direction of Mr. W. S. Robinson, B.A.

MARKET HARBOUROUGH.—On Wednesday, the 14th ult., an Organ Recital was given in the Congregational Church by Mr. F. E. Swan, Organist of Faversham. The programme included works from Bach, Handel, Haydn, Henselt, Wély, and others.

MILNTHORPE, WESTMORELAND.—The Choral Society gave its fifth Concert on the 15th ult., in the Agricultural Hall, when Gade's Erl-King's Daughter was performed. The soloists were Miss Coralie A. Calvert, Miss Irvin, and Mr. Temmison, who did their parts remarkably well. A word of praise is also due to the chorus, which reflects great credit on their Conductor, Mr. T. W. Aldous, B.A.; and for the first time at these Concerts an orchestra was organised, which added to the effect of the performance. In the second part, Miss Coralie A. Calvert and Mr. Temmison were the vocalists. An interesting feature at this Concert was the playing of Mr. W. B. Cross (of Bradford), who contributed two violoncello solos in such a manner as to show his complete mastery of the instrument. Altogether the Concert was a success, and was highly appreciated by a large audience. The chorus also did well in the second part. Mr. Rheam and Mr. Swift accompanied on the pianoforte.

NOTTINGHAM.—The Sacred Harmonic Society gave their second subscription Concert of the 3rd season, on the 8th ult., in the Albert Hall. Sir Michael Costa's Oratorio Eli was the work performed, and the principal vocalists were Madame Lilian Nordica, Madame Marian McKenzie, Mr. Piercy, Mr. Bingley Shaw, and Mr. Barrington Foote. There was a band and chorus of 300 performers under the Conductorship of Mr. John Adcock. Mr. H. Houseley, F.C.O., presided at the organ.

PADIHAM.—A very successful performance of Elijah was given by the Padiham Choral Union, on Monday, the 12th ult. Mr. Worswick was Conductor, and an efficient band was ably led by Herr Jacoby. Miss Hallowell sang the soprano music in a brilliant manner, and was loudly applauded. Miss Howarth, of Padiham, sang the contralto music. Mr. Duckworth, a local tenor, won for himself much applause, as did also Mr. Rickard, of Halifax, whose rendering of the part of the Prophet was highly successful. The concerted music was well sung.

READING.—Mr. John Old's Opera "Herne" was performed with success at the Town Hall, on the 14th ult. The solos were taken by Miss Agnes Larkcom, Miss E. Barnard, Mr. H. Guy, Mr. Huggins, and Mr. Pope. The composer conducted.

RENCORN.—The Tonic Sol-fa Choir gave their first Concert of the season in the Public Hall, on the 28th ult. They were assisted by Eos Morlais (tenor), Miss K. Meredith (contralto), Mrs. W. B. Kay (pianist), and a very efficient band under the leadership of Mr. P. Caldwell. Mendelssohn's 13th Psalm, and a selection from the Crystal Palace programme of the Association of Tonic Sol-fa Choirs, was rendered to a large and highly appreciative audience. Mr. J. Holford conducted.

ST. LEONARD'S.—At the Evensong at Christ Church, on St. Andrew's Day, the whole of Spohr's Last Judgment was sung as the anthem. The treble solos were sung by Master Humm, of the Temple Choir. Mr. W. A. Frost, of St. Paul's Cathedral, was the principal alto, and Mr. T. Kempton, of the same choir, the principal bass. The tenor solos were taken by a member of the local choir. Mr. Walter Goss Custard, the Organist, conducted, and his son, a mere youth, played the whole of the accompaniments and the two difficult long symphonies in the most able manner.

SALISBURY.—A Concert was held in St. Mark's New Hall on the 13th ult., in aid of the Building Fund, when the following ladies and gentlemen kindly gave their services:—Mrs. Steward, Miss Herford, Miss Hay, and the Cathedral Quartet (Messrs. Pitman, Howgate, Crick, and Kelsey), as vocalists; violin (Mr. F. L. Bartlett), violoncello and contra-bass (Mr. A. A. Aylward), pianoforte (Mr. W. T. Bowey), the vocalists contributing each a song, with the addition of part-songs and glees by the Cathedral Quartet. Mr. F. L. Bartlett and Mr. A. A. Aylward were encored for their violin and contra-bass solos, the latter also acting as accompanist. A most successful and enjoyable Invitation Concert was given at the Hamilton Hall on Thursday, the 15th ult., by Mr. T. E. Spinney. Pianoforte solos of the classical school were capably played by the Misses Harris, Bristol, and Parker, and vocal pieces were given by Miss Martin and Miss Perkins, all pupils of Mr. Spinney. The Rev. H. W. Carpenter and the Salisbury Orpheus Society, consisting of male voices only, rendered valuable assistance. Miss Calkin contributed a violin solo, which she played with expression and feeling.

SHEFFIELD.—The numerous Concerts and musical entertainments, both of a public and semi-private character, which have taken place during the past few weeks, as well as a large number in prospective, tend to show that Sheffield is making some development in musical taste. The twenty-fourth Concert of the Sheffield Amateur Harmonic Society was given in the Vestry Hall, Cemetery Road, on the 8th ult. The opening selection was Barnby's scriptural Idyl Rebekah, the dramatis personæ being Rebekah, Miss Sellers; Isaac, Mr. Lees; Eleazar, Mr. Riden. The choral and instrumental portions were taken by members of the Society, Mr. G. Marsden leading the band, Mr. J. A. Rogers presiding at the pianoforte, with Mr. William Chapman as Conductor. After the Cantata a number of songs were given by the principals. The concluding item was Spohr's "God, Thou art Great," which was given in fine style, the soprano solo and subdued chorus, as well as the final chorus, gaining well merited applause. A Concert was given, on the 8th ult., by Mr. Thomas Foulston (Organist of Eccleshall Church), in the School Room, Eccleshall, in aid of the Choir Fund. The programme was unusually good throughout. The concerted music included a Trio in E flat by Beethoven and another by Hummel, and a Duet (violin and pianoforte) grand Fantasia "William Tell." Mr. and Mrs. Makin received an encore for their singing of Balfe's "Think, a Sailor." Mr. Parkin sang "O, haste ye birds," and in response to an encore gave "Sally in our Alley." Messrs. Parkin and Makin's rendering of the well known duet "Excelsior," also by Balfe, was greatly appreciated, as was also Mr. Foulstone's playing. On the 12th ult., the fourth of the free Concerts given by the Master Cutler (J. W. Dixon, Esq.) to the deserving poor of the town, took place in the Cutlers' Hall, which was filled to its utmost capacity. Mr. Dixon and his party occupied seats in the gallery, and their appearance was the signal for long continued applause. Mr. Peck, one of the leading local musicians, was responsible for the arrangements, which were most complete. A very efficient concert party from Liverpool was engaged, and included Mr. Percy Whyte, Mr. Richard Holland, Mr. Frank Weston, Mr. G. Platt, Madame Laura Haworth, and Miss Annie Hallwood. In addition, Mr. E. H. Lemare, Organist of the Parish Church, gave a couple of pianoforte solos with considerable taste. On the same date as the above, the Sheffield Wesleyan Choral Union gave their second Concert in the Music Hall, Surrey Street, which was well patronised. The Society has been in existence barely a year, yet it is in a very vigorous condition, and promises to take a good place among local musical societies. The choir, under the direction of Mr. S. Johnson, gave Mendelssohn's 42nd Psalm and the same composer's Motett "Hear my Prayer." Mr. A. W. Speed presided at the organ, and there was a small string band led by Mr. Peck. Miss Elizabeth Hamlin sustained the solos in both works. Solos, songs, and part-songs, in the second part, afforded a considerable amount of enjoyment.—The forty-eighth Concert of the Sheffield Amateur Musical Society took place in the Albert Hall, on the 16th ult., and was attended by a large and fashionable audience. The programme included Schubert's Mass in E flat, Handel's Organ Concerto in B flat, and Dr. C. Villiers Stanford's Choral Ballad The Revenge. Mr. Peck was leader of the band, and Herr Schollhammer conducted. Mr. J. W. Phillips presided at the organ and played Handel's Concerto in B flat with much power.

SHERBORNE.—The one hundredth Concert of the School Musical Society was given on the 19th ult., and was in all respects most successful. The Sacred Cantata The Holy City, by A. R. Gaul, together with Mozart's Symphony in C, Grétry's Overture "The Caravan," some songs sung by past and present scholars, including a new Festival song, "The new Hundredth," written for the occasion, and the School song, "Carmen Seculare." The whole was directed by Mr. L. N. Parker, who has been Conductor since the thirty-eighth Concert. As a special means of distinguishing the occasion, and of recognising the valuable services of the Conductor, the boys presented him with a testimonial, consisting of a Silver Drum containing fifty sovereigns. Appended to the programme was a short history of the Society and a list of works performed during its existence. This list shows considerable variety of character and good judgment in selection.

SOUTHEND.—The Tribute of the Flowers, a Cantata by Mr. Claude Dupré, was performed by the Choral Society on the 13th ult., at the Public Hall. Mr. W. G. Brighter was the Conductor, and the soloists were Madame Nita Guzman and Mr. Hulbert L. Fulkerson, the former being the authoress of the words of the Cantata. At the close of the performance the applause was loud and long sustained, and the chorists showered bouquets of flowers on the composer and the artists. The second part, miscellaneous, opened with Mendelssohn's Overture "Ruy Blas." The chief features of this part of the entertainment was the clarinet playing of Mr. Henry Lazarus, who responded to an encore with an arrangement of Robert toi que j'aime. Miss Dubois, Madame Nita Guzman, Mrs. Brighter, Mrs. Spain, Mr. Dawson, Mr. Stredwick (flute), and Mr. Hulbert L. Fulkerson contributed.

STRATFORD-ON-AVON.—The Choral Society gave their first Concert of the season on the 13th ult., in the Memorial Theatre, the leading feature being the Oratorio of Samson. The soprano music was allotted to Miss Gill Smith, who made her first appearance in this town; the part of Samson was taken by Mr. Castings, of Hereford Cathedral, Mr. Ineson, of the same Cathedral, taking the part of Harapha; the contralto music being sung by Miss Monica Cox. The orchestra was under the leadership of Mr. A. H. Callaway, the choruses being rendered by the members of the Society, numbering eighty. Mr. J. H. Caseley conducted the Concert, Mrs. A. H. Callaway presided at the piano, and Mr. Eaton at the harmonium. The second part of the Concert was miscellaneous. On the evening previous to the Concert Mr. Caseley was presented with a very handsome ivory baton, mounted in silver, and elegantly engraved.

ULVERSTON.—A very successful performance of Mendelssohn's Elijah was given on the 9th ult., in Holy Trinity Church, by the church choir, assisted by friends, numbering in all about 100 in the band and chorus. The principal vocalists were Miss Fosselle, Miss Dews, Mr. Arthur Castings, and Mr. Frederic King, who all acquitted themselves most satisfactorily. The chorus singing was especially noticeable for the certainty of attack and excellent intonation. An efficient band (which included several members of Mr. C. Hallé's orchestra) under the leadership of Mons. Lexhine, of Barrow-in-Furness, rendered the instrumental portion of the Oratorio admirably. Mr. G. Denholm Walker presided at the organ, and Mr. S. Atkinson, the Organist and Choirmaster of the Church, conducted.

WAKEFIELD.—A miscellaneous Concert was given on the 9th ult., at the Mechanics' Institute, in aid of the Wakefield Guild of Pity. The programme was arranged by Mdlle. de Nohac. Mr. Edgar Haddock played four pieces by Ferdinand David, pianoforte accompaniments by Mr. J. N. Hardy. Mdlle. de Nohac took part with Mr. Haddock in Beethoven's Sonata in D major (Op. 12, No. 1) and Schubert's Sonata in D (Op. 137, No. 1), and as her solos, selected "La Truite," by Stephen Heller, and the Adagio and Rondo from Weber's Sonata (Op. 24). The latter movement secured an encore. The vocalists were Miss Wakefield and Mr. Harold Savery.

WARE, HERTS.—A Recital was given in the Parish Church, on the 6th ult., by Messrs. H. W. Weston, F.C.O., of Balham, S.W., and J. L. Gregory, F.C.O. The programme comprised a Dramatic Fantasia, The Royal Banners, by Dr. C. Pearce; Best's Christmas Pastorale, Prelude and Fugue in G major (Bach), a Festival Overture by Carl Loewe, played by Mr. H. W. Weston; Rea's Variations, and Smart's Postlude in E flat, played by Mr. J. L. Gregory, who also contributed two vocal solos.

WARRINGTON.—The first Concert for the season was given on the 16th ult. by the Musical Society, under the direction of Dr. Hiles. A selection from Handel's Solomon, the dramatic Cantata Ariadne, by J. More Smiiton, and the Chorus and Dance of Reapers and Gleaners from Cowen's Ruth were included in the programme. Mrs. Lane, Miss Monks, and Miss Rose Gunton (all pupils of Dr. Hiles) met with enthusiastic applause, and Mr. Levison Wyatt (Chester) and Dr. W. H. Wallington took the tenor and bass solos. Especial mention should be made of the help so ably rendered by the Organist, Mr. E. T. Driffield (Liverpool), and of the efficient singing of the choir. For the second Concert Samson is announced.

WATFORD.—An Organ Recital was given in the Parish Church on Wednesday evening, the 7th ult., by Mr. T. W. Bevan, the Organist. The programme consisted of selections from the works of Spohr, Gounod, Lemmens, Wely, and Scotson Clark. The singing of the choir was very creditable, especially in the Anthem "God hath appointed a day" (B. Tours), and the rendering of the Gloria from Mozart's Second Mass was also very good.

WAVERTREE (LIVERPOOL).—A Lecture on English Cathedral Music was given on the 8th ult., by Mr. Fred. H. Burstall, L.Mus., F.C.O., Cathedral Organist, in the Town Hall. The Cathedral choir illustrated the lecturer's remarks with examples from anthems by Dr. Tye, Tallis, Orlando Gibbons, Sterndale Bennett, and Dr. G. C. Martin, the only living writer illustrated. The Lecture and Concert were very enjoyable, the audience expressing appreciation of the manner in which the subject was treated.

WEST COWES.—The Northwood Musical Society gave a fine performance of the Creation on the 15th ult. The principal vocalists were Mrs. Mason, Mr. Charles Pillow, and Mr. Seymour Kelly (Chichester Cathedral). Mr. Edward Jones was leader of the orchestra, and Mr. W. Scadding presided at the organ. Mr. F. Rutland was the Conductor.

WHITBY.—On Tuesday, the 6th ult., the Choral Society, under Mr. Hallgate's direction, gave a miscellaneous Concert, including Mendelssohn's Motett "Hear my Prayer." Mr. John Dunn played some violin solos. The solo vocalists were Madame C. Gardiner, Nottingham; Miss Morris, and Mr. Dunkerton, both of Lincoln.

WHITCHURCH, HANTS.—The fourth Concert of the Choral Society took place in the Town Hall, on the 20th ult., when Stainer's Cantata The Daughter of Jairus was performed. Mrs. E. Adams, Mr. E. J. Hunt, and Mr. Herbert Noakes were the solo vocalists, and Miss Laura Vink was the accompanist. Mr. H. E. Powell was an efficient Conductor.

WIGAN.—The Trinity College Local Choir gave their first Concert of the season on the 21st ult., when The Messiah was performed, under the conductorship of Mr. A. Alexander. The principals were Miss Fanny Bristowe, Miss S. Riley, Mr. C. W. Fredericks, and Mr. D. Sutton Shepley.

WINDSOR.—The first Concert this season of the Windsor and Eton Amateur Madrigal Society took place on the 8th ult., under the direction of Mr. Walter Parratt. There was a well varied selection of unaccompanied vocal music, in which H.K.H. the Princess Christian took part.—The first Concert of the Windsor and Eton Choral Society was given on the 19th ult., under the direction of Mr. Samuel Smith. Judas Macabbeus was the work performed, the principal singers being Miss Catherine Penna, Miss Agnes Chester, Mr. J. Gawthrop, and Mr. Lucas Williams. Mr. G. Morsch led the orchestra, and Mr. H. R. Coudrey was at the harmonium.—The first two parts of Bach's "Christmas Music" were performed in the place of an Anthem at the Special Service in St. George's Chapel on Christmas Eve, the choir being augmented by the Amateur Madrigal Society. The accompaniments were well rendered on the organ by Mr. W. Parratt. The deficiency in the past two seasons, amounting to £12 13s. 10d., has been most generously made up by the Amateur Madrigal Society from their balance in hand.—The Eton College Musical Society gave performances, on the 10th and 12th ult., in the College Hall, under the direction of Mr. Barnby, of Cellier's Gray's Elegy and a miscellaneous selection, which ended with the Carmen Etonensis. The pianoforte and violin solos were well played.

WITNEY, OXON.—A successful Concert was given by the Witney Singing Class on the 15th ult., in the large hall of the New Schools, when Mendelssohn's Elijah was performed. The work was rendered entirely by members of the class, Mr. F. S. Walter very ably sustaining the part of the Prophet. Mrs. C. W. Early, Mrs. Young, Miss E. Smith, Miss Kate Jones, and Mr. J. Verney were the other soloists. The chorus numbered fifty, and performed their share of the work with due care and ability. Miss Dickinson and Mr. W. H. Tarrant presided at the piano; Mr. J. W. Owens (son of the Organist at St. Mary's) was at the harmonium, and Mr. D. Young conducted.

WORCESTER.—Mr. Josef Cantor's "Gems of the Opera Company," twenty-one in number, gave an interesting and varied Concert at the Public Hall on the 12th ult., under the auspices of Mr. Spark, which was greatly enjoyed by those present.

YIEWSLEY.—The members of the Choral Society inaugurated their fourth season, on the 1st ult., by a Concert, the chief attraction of which was a representation of Edmund Rogers's humorous Cantata Beauty and the Beast. The work was well received, the solos being effectively sung by Miss Edith Price, Miss Amy Becket, Mr. F. Brown, and Mr. Hugh Roy. The miscellaneous portion of the programme included songs by the artists named; violin solos by Mdlle. Berthe Baudet; a flute solo by Mr. E. Jekyll Williams, and a selection of glees. The accompanists were Miss Becket, Miss Price, Miss Thatcher, and Mr. J. H. English. Mr. Davies conducted.

ORGAN APPOINTMENTS.—Mr. Fred. W. Howland, to the Wesleyan Chapel, Drayton Park, N.—Mr. W. G. Whale, Organist and Choirmaster to St. Paul's Church, Bray, co. Wicklow.—Mr. Walter Alcock, Organist and Choirmaster to Quebec Chapel, Bryanston Street, W.—Mr. William Dale, Organist and Choirmaster to King Edward Street Chapel, Macclesfield.—Mr. Walter Holmes, Organist and Choirmaster to Laisterdyke Congregational Church.—Mr. G. F. Wesley Martin, to St. Saviour's, Walthamstow.—Mr. George Elliott, to the Episcopal Church, Balham Park Road, Balham.—Mr. C. W. Hanson, Organist and Choirmaster to St. John the Evangelist, Bromley, Kent.—Mr. J. E. Jaques, to St. Luke's Episcopal Church, Peterborough, Ontario, Canada.

CHOIR APPOINTMENTS.—Mr. Charles Iseard, Conductor to the Choral Society in connection with Bloomsbury Chapel, Soho, W.—Mr. Frederick W. Doe, Conductor to St. Anne's (Wandsworth) Vocal Union.—Mr. Adolph Bayschlag, Conductor to the St. Cecilia Society, Bradford.—Mr. Henry A. Hughes, Conductor to the Pearl Assurance Musical Society.

DEATHS.

THE CRUCIFIXION
A MEDITATION

ON THE

Sacred Passion of the Holy Redeemer

THE WORDS SELECTED AND WRITTEN BY THE

REV. W. J. SPARROW-SIMPSON, M.A.

SET TO MUSIC BY

J. STAINER.

This Work is an attempt to supply the want long felt of an easy and short form of Passion Music suitable for use in ordinary parish churches. It is composed for two solo voices, a Tenor and a Bass, and for the church choir. At intervals hymns occur, in which the whole congregation can join. The performance will probably not extend over forty minutes in duration, thus giving an opportunity for a suitable "address" if thought advisable. No orchestra is required, the accompaniments being specially adapted for the organ only; much of the expense usually attending Passion Services will therefore be avoided. The book of the words, for distribution among the congregation, will contain the music of the Hymns; by this means it is hoped that the congregation will be induced to take part heartily in the service.

AN ORATORIO COMPOSED BY

GEO. SHINN, MUS. BAC., CANTAB.

(SUITABLE FOR CONCERT ROOM OR CHURCH.)

Price 2s. Cloth, 3s. 6d.; Sol-fa, 1s.

"Mr. Shinn is well known as the author of several Cantatas and other compositions, all of which are written in a style at once musicianly and popular. 'The Captives of Babylon' may be highly commended as an interesting and valuable addition to our shorter Oratorios and Cantatas. The work contains several solos of much beauty; also duets, quartets, and choruses in great variety. Choral Societies, which desire an interesting and moderately easy work to perform, will do well to select this Oratorio. It will well repay the time spent in its preparation, and will be sure to take."—Sunday School Chronicle.

"The music is appropriate, interesting, melodious, and but of moderate difficulty. The work is one of Mr. Shinn's best efforts, and we all know that Mr. Shinn has written some charming music. We heartily recommend this Oratorio to Choral Societies."—Essex County Chronicle.

"The Captives of Babylon' will be found a welcome addition to the répertoires of Choral Societies and Church Choirs."—The Musical World.

"The libretto is well chosen, and forms a good base whereon to compose a first-rate work. With regard to the music we feel we can hardly do it justice. Mr. Shinn's composition is a veritable picture, following the details of his subject minutely. Where all is so good it is difficult to mention any special numbers. We certainly advise our readers to hear the work and judge for themselves."—United Service Gazette.

"It is cleverly written, and in an attractive style. The music is of a varied and pleasing character, so that it is likely to become very popular."—The Portsmouth Evening Mail.

"An effective work."—Musical Opinion.

"Contains many very interesting numbers, and will doubtless be much appreciated by those in search of something new."—The Newcastle Daily Journal.

"Mr. Shinn is well known, and deservedly so for his musical talent. Continuity of design and freshness of conception are apparent throughout the work. It contains many effective solos and choruses, and the music is not difficult. There is no doubt that the Oratorio will become very popular."—South London Press.

JOAN OF ARC

AN HISTORICAL AND DRAMATIC CANTATA

FREDERICK ENOCH

ALFRED R. GAUL.

"The music from beginning to end is of the highest order, both in form, construction, dramatic expression, and religious colouring. Particularly beautiful is the great wealth of melody, which carries with it the impression that it is the outcome of the inspiration and genius of a highly-refined musician. . . . The Cantata is even a more masterly and beautiful work than 'The Holy City,' . . . 'Joan of Arc' is one of the most melodious, refined, and expressive works that has come under our notice."—Huddersfield Examiner.

"It is a matter of congratulation that Mr. A. R. Gaul's work should have been selected for representation this year. No more charming Cantata than 'Joan of Arc' could have been chosen. It abounds in delicious music. There is not a tedious note in it, nor any number which can be accused of impairing the dignity of a composition having a lofty aim."—Newcastle-on-Tyne Daily Chronicle.

"The purpose of the music of 'Joan of Arc' is thoroughly evident throughout the work, and the many descriptive passages are admirably suited to the composer's intentions, and give the listener a vivid and realistic impression, its attractiveness being continuous instead of spasmodic."—Bradford Observer.

"The Cantata possesses many interesting features and admirable qualities. The choruses are always effectively written—the solos are extremely melodious; in fact, this is a distinct characteristic of the entire work, which will doubtless recommend it strongly to choral societies desirous of pleasing the public. On the whole, the Cantata is a healthy work of a conscientious musician, which deserves and will probably achieve, great popularity."—Newcastle-on-Tyne Daily Journal.

"There is a reality about the whole tone of the work that seems to bring every scene in the life of the French heroine vividly before us."—Border Counties Herald.

"The subject is a fascinating one, and dramatic enough to serve for an opera. The construction of the text (by Mr. Frederick Enoch) is more in favour of the musician than librettos generally are. 'Joan of Arc' is a useful work, its abundance of melody and comparative easiness will commend it to the numerous choral societies throughout the country."—Newcastle-on-Tyne Daily Leader.

"It would not be surprising if it attained to even the almost phenomenal popularity of 'The Holy City'; for, although its subject is so different, it is laid down very much upon the same lines, and contains a similar wealth of melody and effective part-writing."—Birmingham Daily Times.

"Reading the score convinces us that it is our townsman's greatest production. The music displays more skilful workmanship than any music we have received from the same hands. . . . Could have been originated by none but a born melodist."—Birmingham Daily Gazette.

"A distinct advance upon Mr. Gaul's previous work in cantata form. . . . A constant flow of exquisite melodies and effective choral writing."—Birmingham Daily Post.

"Now with matured experience and ripened scholarship he gives to the town which has received and welcomed his first triumphs his magnum opus, 'Joan of Arc.'"—Birmingham Daily Mail.

"The Cantata, from the first bar to the last, is rich in melody, beautiful harmonic combinations, and clever orchestration. The beautiful 'Ave Maria' is a splendid example of pure and fervent church music, but there are so many exquisite points of merit in Mr. Gaul's latest work that they hardly need detailing. Taking the work as a whole, it bids fair to become a great favourite with all choral societies."—Birmingham Weekly Post.

"A thoroughly melodious work, and should find favour with choral societies. It is not difficult to sing, and contains sufficient variety to keep up the interest to the end."—Manchester Guardian.

Price, paper covers, 2s. 6d.; ditto, boards, 3s.; scarlet cloth, 4s.; Tonic Sol-fa, 1s.; Vocal parts, each 1s. Words only, 7s. 6d. per 100. (Ent. Sta. Hall.)

The gratuitous loan of Instrumental Parts may be had on application to the Composer, and full liberty is given to perform this Cantata and to insert the words in any programme without further permission.

RUTH

Words by EDWARD OXENFORD

ALFRED R. GAUL.

"The work, like the 'Holy City,' is full of beautiful orchestral passages, while the vocal score abounds with charming numbers."—Bucks Herald.

"'Ruth' is a work of sterling power; its musical form is that of perfect tunefulness combined with simplicity and strength. . . . The composer has grasped his theme in a thoroughly sympathetic manner, and has produced a work which is worthy of the subject."—Bradford Observer.

"Bright, tuneful, fresh, and musicianly—this work will be a great favourite, and will add to Mr. Gaul's reputation."—Birmingham Weekly Dart.

"'Ruth' has been set to music by several composers; none, however, has become so worthily popular as the Cantata under notice. . . . It contains some charming music, and is highly characteristic of the story it so vividly illustrates."—South Wilts Express.

"Full of flowing melody."—Salisbury Times.

PERFORMED IN THE TOWN HALL, BIRMINGHAM,
ON TWELVE OCCASIONS.

Vocal Score, paper cover, 2s.; ditto, paper boards, 2s. 6d.; cloth, 4s.
The Choruses (only) in Vocal Score, for Musical Societies, paper cover, 1s.

Tonic Sol-fa Edition, 9d. The gratuitous loan of Band Parts may be had on application to the Composer, and full liberty is given to perform this Cantata and to insert the words in any programme without further permission.

CONCONE'S LESSONS

WITH MARKS OF

EXPRESSION & PHRASING

BY

ALBERTO RANDEGGER.

Price One Shilling and Sixpence each.

50 Lessons for the Medium part of the Voice.

40 Lessons for Contralto.

40 Lessons for Bass or Baritone.

25 Lessons for the Medium Voice

(IN THE PRESS).

The sterling value and great usefulness of Concone's Lessons have been so long recognised and so generally admitted, that their extensive adoption caused, as a natural consequence, the issue of numerous editions in almost every country where the study of the Art of Singing is cultivated. No edition, however, which has hitherto come under my notice, seems to me as correct, complete, and reliable as it should be.

I have endeavoured to rectify this deficiency by adding in the present edition signs of expression and phrasing, where I considered it expedient to do so, completing, and in some cases altering, the breathing marks, and altogether carefully revising the whole work.

THE END.

* The title "Very Difficult" is not meant to convey the idea that this Section will provide pieces of the extreme difficulty suited to exceptional cases only (this being beyond the scope of a "School"); it is by taxing in a high degree the general Student's intellectual faculties as well as their mechanical powers that the works included will be found "very difficult" to play well.

ORGANISTS AND ORGAN STUDENTS.

AINSWORTH'S PATENT ACTIONS & ORGAN PEDALS

May be easily attached to any Piano, Harmonium, or Organ, and they afford perfectly unique Pedal Practice. Having put down at my Works two Engines and Machinery of the most desirable kind, I am now supplying my goods to the Trade and Profession at actually lower prices than that charged for the Old Roller Action and its modifications. You are kindly requested to have one of AINSWORTH'S Illustrated Lists by you. On receipt of trade or professional card you will receive Lists and liberal terms. All AINSWORTH'S Actions from Class C upwards are fitted with Modifying Stop, whereby the whole compass of pedal notes are modified (pp, p, f, ff) at will, although the performer pedal exactly the same.

MY DEAR SIR,—I have much pleasure in informing you that your Pedals have given the fullest satisfaction. I have them combined with my practice Piano. Many of my musical friends who have seen them, as well as my organ pupils, are quite delighted with them; and I must acknowledge that I have never met with any Pedals so noiseless and pleasant to play upon as yours. The Action I consider durable, and of very good workmanship. Every organist who desires to perfect his playing will welcome your invention. I can recommend your goods in every respect.

To JOHN AINSWORTH, Esq.

EDVARD GRIEG.

To understand the artistic character and work of this composer, Englishmen must do what is for them a somewhat difficult thing, and put themselves in sympathy with the intense feeling of nationality which often inspires the inhabitants of a poor country when made conscious of its inferiority by political connection with a more powerful and dominant state. We, whose concerns are as world-wide as the British Empire, who know no masters and no superiors, can hardly be expected to understand such a sentiment. It seems to us puerile, in many of its manifestations, at any rate, and we look on with wonder, not unmixed with impatience, when Scotland becomes irritably jealous for her institutions, Wales blazes up with a purely "local" spirit, or Ireland demands self-government. Circumstances, however, are forcing upon the Imperial Englishman some measure of perception as to this matter. We are beginning to see that national feeling is a force which must be reckoned with in a variety of ways. Nowhere, perhaps, does that feeling exercise a more potent influence than in Norway. The Norwegian has a poor country, counting for little in the world's estimation of physical and moral forces, and overshadowed as a State by its greater and wealthier neighbour, Sweden. But he loves his motherland with a passionate devotion; he is proud of her traditions and history—the history of an unconquerable few; his affection for her valleys and mountains is a commanding passion; he answers as no other can to the spirit of her literature and art, and is far more proud of all she is, and hopeful of all she may be, than the dwellers in mighty lands can conceive. This intense sentiment finds many outlets, but we are concerned here only with its influence upon the art of music.

More than most northern races, the Norwegians are lovers of music, to the instinct of which everything in the physical features and the history of their country makes appeal. Interesting testimony to this fact appears in an article long ago contributed to Macmillan's Magazine by Mr. Otto Goldschmidt. The writer said:—

"When, on my visits to England, I had been some time in London, in the Eastern Counties, in Surrey, in Kent, and in the Isle of Wight, it struck me that in my strolls through streets and lanes, high-roads and woods, I had never heard the people sing. I certainly had heard, for instance, the black minstrels and such other bands; but I do not call that a singing of the people, but a more or less bad execution of individual compositions. The people's song descends from the air; it rushes forth from the forests, the rivers, the mountains; it lives in tradition, it was never composed, never taught man by man. I remember when once, with a friend, passing over Tower Hill, hearing a plaintive sound proceeding from a crowd. I asked him what was the matter, and on being told 'A Ballad Singer,' I hastened to the spot to catch a musical sound, however coarse, from the people of England. Alas! it was only a poor starving woman crying out for bread, and in false rhythms offering printed ballads for sale. My thought reverted to the time when I visited Norway, and when, having crossed the Farn Tinn lake and entered Vestfiorddal, Aagot, the daughter of my host, at dusk took down the langeley and sang. Oh! for those sweet simple lays of love and feud, fragrant with naive faith in a mysterious destiny, that selects the best hearts, the loveliest girl, and the bravest lad for the greatest joy and the deepest pain. As for the strain, the music itself, if you were to ask Aagot who made it, she would not tell it to a stranger, but perhaps later, when you had won her confidence and made her trust you were no unbeliever, no 'scorner of simple folk,' she would tell you that her great grandmother had the melody from a man whose great-grandfather had learnt it of the Fossekarl (the spirit of the waterfall), or from the Hulder, the mysterious ever-young shepherdess, who had fallen in love with him."

So music entwines itself with every form of the life of this interesting people. When Ole Bull was buried at Bergen, the peasantry, who, it is said, knew his music by heart, paid the dead violinist a touching tribute. These men, "in their lonely, poverty-stricken huts, had been proud of the man who had played their 'Gamle Norge' before the kings of the earth. They were there by hundreds, each bringing a green bough, or a fern, or a flower; they waited humbly till all others had left the grave, then crowded up and threw in each man the only token he had been rich enough to bring. The grave was filled to the brim." Rude may be the minstrelsy of Norway, but the spirit of music dwells with the people, who look forward, we doubt not, to a time when the harp of Earl Eric, played by King Harald at the feast in Rogaland, shall be its true symbol:—"But when the boards were taken up, the earl let bear forth good things, which he had chosen for the king, and to all his men he gave some good gift or other; and at the end of this gift-giving, the earl let bear forth a harp, whose strings were this one of gold and that one of silver, and the fashion of it most glorious; and the king stretched forth his hand to meet it and began to smite it, and so great and fair a voice had this harp that all wondered, and thought they had never heard the like before."

Given a people with musical instincts and intense national feeling, and there we have the conditions under which music is cultivated as a source of national distinction and pride. All evidence goes to show that Norwegian art is intensely patriotic. By the grave side of Ole Bull, the uttered words mingled the glory of "old Norway" with that of the dead violinist. Björnsterne Björnson said:—"Patriotism was the creative power in his life. When he established the Norse theatre, assisted Norse art, helped the national museum, his mighty instrument singing for other patriotic ends; when he helped his countrymen and others wherever he found them, it was not so much for the object, or the person, as for the honour of Norway. He always felt himself our representative, and if he felt there was need, let it be at home or abroad, that 'Ole Olsen Viol, Norse Norman from Norway,' should appear, he never failed us." The same note is struck by Wergeland, when he makes Norway sing—

Oh, world-wide is my son's fair fame!
Anew my eye is proud aflame.
On, on, my son! when thou art blest
'Tis blessing in thy Mother's breast.
A poet I, for ages long:
The Norseman's legends are my song.
My epic have I written too,
A noble thought each hero true.

Lastly, we may quote the words of Edward Grieg himself on the same occasion. With him, too, the theme was the Motherland:—"Because more than any other thou wast the glory of our land; because more than any other thou hast carried our people with thee up towards the bright heights of art; because thou wast more than any other a pioneer of our young national music, more, much more than any other, the faithful, warm-hearted conqueror of all hearts; because thou hast planted a seed which shall spring up in the future, and for which coming generations shall bless thee with the gratitude of thousands—for all this, in the name of our Norse musical art, I lay this laurel wreath on thy coffin."

In all this we have indications of a state of things adapted to exercise an immense influence upon Norwegian art and artists; the best proof of which may be discovered in the fact that Scandinavian composers almost entirely limit themselves to the musical dialect of their own land. In this they resemble those of other nationalities similarly situated. Chopin, as the representative of Poland; Dvůrák, as the representative of Bohemia, stand prominently forward in illustration. They are patriots in music, embodiments of the musical instincts of their people. Such a representative and such a patriot is Edward Grieg, of whom we must now think as a man devoted to love of country, jealous for the glory of Norway, confident in her genius, and by these feelings influenced throughout his life and work.

Grieg's life has been singularly uneventful, as the world counts events. Last month we had to speak of Brahms under the same circumstances, and to point out how little that master's career lends itself to a descriptive pen, or appeals to the imagination. The Norwegian, like the German, is a quiet, plodding musician, content, personally, to show himself over a very limited part of the earth's surface, and to be known by his works rather than by face, form, and speech. It is well, perhaps, that we have some of these earnest souls left—men suggestive to us of the great artists of the past, who laboured with far less care for an individual triumph than for the glory of their craft, and even whose names, in many cases, have not come down to us, though their masterpieces survive. Grieg was born at Bergen in June, 1843, and educated there till he had reached the age of fifteen. In his case, unlike that of many others, circumstances were favourable to the development of inborn musical talent. His father, who represented some foreign country as consul at the Norwegian port, had a good position, and his mother early taught him the elements of the art in which he is now so distinguished.

Details as to Grieg's early years are not accessible, but it would seem that he made good use of the advantages that came in his way, and was quite a boy when certain of his compositions were brought under the notice of Ole Bull, who was also a native of Bergen, and occasionally returned thither from his extensive wanderings. The biography of the Norwegian violinist, published not long ago by his widow, contains no reference to this fact, but we learn from other sources that Bull was much struck by the talent of his compatriot, and strongly persuaded Grieg's parents to give him a musical education. Advice from Ole Bull in Bergen was almost equivalent to a command which must be obeyed at any cost. It was followed in this case without much demur, young Edward being sent to the Conservatorium of Leipzig in 1858, when he was fifteen years old. He remained there four years, having Hauptmann and Richter as his masters for harmony and counterpoint, Rietz and Reinecke for composition, and Moscheles for the piano. According to Mr. Edward Dannreuther, who, we believe, was his fellow-student in the Saxon city, Grieg, "during the term of his studies, lived mostly in the romantic worlds of Schumann, Mendelssohn, and Chopin, whose works then gave the tone to the entire musical life of the town, and especially of the Conservatorium. He has since become aware of other older and newer masters, without, however, showing very distinct traces of their influence in his compositions." The young Norwegian may have been far from suspecting the line he was afterwards to take, but Providence had a mission for him other than that of working in one of many rival schools, and fighting the battles of Tweedle-dum against the forces of Tweedle-dee. It seems, indeed, that we may recognise the hand of an over-ruling fate in the illness which compelled him (1862) to quit Leipzig and return to his own country, which, as far as we have been able to ascertain, he has not since left for the purpose of residence abroad. During many years he has resided at Christiania, where he acts as teacher and conductor; where, also, he enjoys a pension bestowed upon him by the Norwegian Diet, to the end that he may devote himself, without concern for daily bread, to the highest musical interests of his country. This is all of Grieg's outer life that there is to tell. To his inner life, save as reflected in his works, there is no present access, but, mayhap, when he has passed away, survivors will know him thoroughly, just as the great masters of our own past are known to us by the publication of their most intimate confessions.

Turning to Grieg's work as a composer, we at once find ample evidence to justify all that has been said on the score of his patriotic musicianship. He took home with him from Leipzig a knowledge of how to express himself, a mastery of form, and acquaintance generally with the apparatus of composition, but for the rest—for ideas, spirit, character, poetry—he owes nothing to any land save his own. Not every nationality is rich enough to furnish a musician in this matter. An Englishman, for example, could derive but small help from the popular music of his country. But Norway is a mine of wealth to her artists, and gifted beyond most lands with characteristic songs, picturesque legends, romantic history, and a physical aspect that of itself stimulates the imagination. Naturally the folk-music of Scandinavia catches some of the gloom and sternness of nature, but, strangely enough—and here the wide contrast between a Northern winter and a Northern summer may suggest a cause—some of them are as effusively cheerful as those of Naples. In his work on "The Study of National Music," the late Carl Engel wrote:—"It is a curious fact that those nations which possess the most lugubrious music, possess also the most hilarious tunes. The songs of the Norwegians are generally very plaintive, though at the same time very beautiful: and some of the Norwegian dances have, perhaps, more resemblance to the dirges than to the dances of some other nations; but in single instances the Norwegian tunes exhibit an unbounded joy and cheerfulness, such as we rarely meet with in the music of other people. Indeed, the Norwegians, as far as their music is concerned, might be compared to the hypochondriac, who occasionally, though but seldom, gives himself up to an almost excessive merriment." To the manner of such music born, and deeply in sympathy with all around him, Grieg early proclaimed himself a Norwegian composer. What that means, and what sort of music a Norwegian composer writes, when he is nearest to the sources of his country's art, may be seen in some "Pianoforte Albums," recently published by Messrs. Novello, Ewer and Co. Here we have nothing of "form," development, or aught else extraneous in origin. For the most part the little pieces are melodies strongly marked by Norwegian characteristics, and accompanied more with reference to the emphasising of those characteristics than to anything else. In this matter Grieg allows himself a free hand, very properly insisting upon truth to nature. As for the melodies themselves, it is impossible to convey, in words, an idea of their quaint beauty. Occasionally one is met with that by regularity of phrase and conventionality of expression sounds familiar even to foreign ears, but the major part is strange. Plaintiveness, even sadness, is a common feature, and over all seems to be thrown the tender grace of the flowers that bloom on Norwegian hills in, so we may fancy, melancholy anticipation of the early Northern winter. Let the following be given as an example. It is entitled "Folk Song":—

And this also—a waltz theme—

Can anything be more artless or, at the same time, more charming? The melodies of which the foregoing present samples are imitations of national style, but they might have been born among the people in that anonymous, mysterious way which makes it impossible to discover the source of beauty to the like of which Mr. Goldschmidt's Norwegian maiden attributed a supernatural origin.

We repeat that these little pianoforte pieces, in themselves gems of price, should be studied as showing how thoroughly Grieg absorbed the spirit and character of the national music of his country.

The short pieces just referred to are, of course, national music and nothing else. We have now to see Grieg carrying the sentiment and character of his country's art into compositions of a larger form and higher class. Let us take, for example, the two "Elegiac Melodies" (Op. 34) for orchestra, not long since performed at the London Symphony Concerts. In the case of these works, we again meet with the structure of Scandinavian popular tune, and its peculiarly tender and gentle sadness—an expression quite sui generis—

But this is not all of distinctiveness, for Grieg, though limited to a string orchestra, so accompanies the melodies that we are constrained by some instinct of perception to recognise the general effect as no less national than the partial. There is in it a sombre northern tone, a grave northern utterance which, somehow, appears to bring up before us the pine-clad hills and deep-shadowed fiords of Norseland. Different of character and purpose are the "Lyrical Pieces" (Op. 38 and 43) for the pianoforte. These are short works with descriptive titles, as "Berceuse," "Spring Dance," &c., or else they are examples of Norwegian dance measures, and so on. The second class are, of course, nothing but national in form and sentiment, and we turn to the first with more interest because expectant of Norwegian characteristics in works of more than local scope. No disappointment ensues. In the "Berceuse," it is a Norwegian mother who rocks her child to sleep—and as here so in other instances. Hardly, as a matter of fact, can a piece be found altogether free from local colouring. The composer seems to be possessed by the genius of his country's strains. He is its prophet and mouthpiece—a Norwegian musician and nothing else.

Grieg, as the reader well knows, does not limit himself to pieces of lyrical dimensions and character. He is the author of large works in classic form, as, for example, the Violin Sonatas in F (Op. 8) and G minor (Op. 13), and the Violoncello Sonata in A minor (Op. 36). Necessarily in these cases, the composer appears to some extent as a cosmopolitan musician. Norway has no musical forms apart from simple melodies, and the Norwegian musician working on the higher lines of art must borrow his models. But he can infuse into his productions more or less of the national musical dialect and feeling, and this is precisely what Grieg does. The Sonata in F is a remarkable illustration of the fact. In the very opening theme, we have more than a suggestion of the melodies dear to Norwegian people—

Throughout the work the same individual character prevails, and, to a greater or less extent, this may be said of the other Sonatas mentioned above. Hence the peculiar and distinctive charm that attends the works of Grieg. We find the old world-wide forms instinct with a new spirit, and the tongue of universal culture made to utter sentences classically shaped but rich in novel and piquant turns, that somehow appeal to us as having their source less in art than in nature. Foreigners cannot be expected to share all the sympathy which a Norwegian must feel for what is national in Grieg's art, but we can enjoy, and be thankful for an opportunity of enjoying, its freshness and beauty. The conventional language of music is so far exhausted that only a man of genius can hope to command attention in using it. The man with no genius is confined to platitudes, and his hearers are consequently driven to weariness. The remedy for this is—and musicians are beginning to find it out—a closer alliance with that which is distinctly national, which means resort to the original sources of music as they lie, a living power, deep down in the hearts of the people. There, as Grieg proves, may strength and variety be found, and there may the secret be learned which enables a musician to emulate the fabled deeds of Orpheus, who "made trees, And the mountain tops that freeze, Bow themselves when he did sing." In music, as in other arts, we must now and then go back to nature. The painter who composes landscapes in his studio soon becomes stilted, artificial, conventional, and so does the musician in an analogous case. There is no doing without the breezy hill-side, the quiet sun-lit lake, the magnificent ocean, the peaceful valley, the calm summer-day, the roaring winter-storm. One of Edward Grieg's claims to honour and regard is that he has shown the way to nature and the advantage of her company.

VERNON LEE ON MUSICAL SUGGESTIVENESS AND MUSICAL PERSONALITY.

THESE remarkable essays,* in view, doubtless, of the character of the writer's previous efforts, have been treated hitherto as a contribution to the domain of letters pure and simple, and hence their close connection with music has been strangely overlooked in such reviews as we have come across. This omission, which we now propose to remedy to the best of our ability, is strangely characteristic of the attitude of literary men towards music. It is hard to say whether their neglect or their patronage is the more exasperating. Saint-Saëns speaks resentfully of the unfair advantage that a brilliant essayist has over a musician in talking about the art in which the latter is so intimately concerned. His style and literary ease help him to impose upon the guileless public, and lend weight to the most unfounded assertions. It is all the more satisfactory, then, to find, as in the present case, powers of expression cultivated to a remarkable pitch, combined with a real sympathy for, and considerable knowledge of, the subject under discussion. Of all the lady members of the honourable Corporation of the Goosequill, as Thackeray called the profession of letters, none wields an abler pen than the gifted writer who chooses to veil her identity beneath the pseudonym of Vernon Lee. She is deeply read but never pedantic, so light is her touch and natural her style; and where one most entirely dissents from her views it is impossible to withhold one's admiration at the ability with which she states her case, and the adroitness with which she forestalls and parries objections. Turning from generalities to a consideration of the specific references to music in these pages, and passing over a few incidental allusions in the early chapters of the book, we encounter, under the title of "Prosaic Music and Poetic Music," a disquisition suggested by hearing within the space of forty-eight hours two such widely different operas as Boito's "Mefistofele" and Cimarosa's "Matrimonio Segreto." After dwelling on the essentially poetic and suggestive character of Boito's music, and the absolute lack of any such element of poetry or romance in the libretto of the "Matrimonio Segreto," Vernon Lee is obliged to admit that, spite of the incongruous setting, there is something undefinable in the melodies of Cimarosa's opera which makes the same impression as the phantasmagoric visions of "Mefistofele," "something that at bottom is of identical nature, something we call music and feel inclined to call poetry." The lack of imaginativeness in the eighteenth century librettos is well illustrated by the fact that Gluck and his librettist Calzabigi, "both of them furious reformers, pre-Wagnerian Wagnerists, were never struck with the idea, which every fifth-rate composer would have to-day, of using up in their opera the barbaric, fantastic, and gruesomely imaginative element contained in the massacre of Orpheus by the frantic Mænads. Orpheus and Eurydice are sent home quickly at the end of the third act, like a newly-married couple returning from their honeymoon."

But returning to the question of what constitutes this romantic or poetic quality of music, as illustrated by the "Canta Sirena" in "Mefistofele," Vernon Lee asks of what is the music suggestive? Of the siren, of course, and the full moon! But, after all, where are they to be found if not in the words? "As to the music, it would be difficult to point out in what particular arrangement of notes there is any allusion to a siren or a full moon; indeed, it might be hard to convey either of the two items to the mind of the audience, if that audience happened not to understand the words." The best commentary on the foregoing remarks is furnished by the unquestioned fact that abstract music, such as the symphonies of Beethoven, music of the most imaginative or poetic cast, will awaken totally different emotions and make totally different pictures in the minds of different people. In some, these mental pictures are hardly produced at all, and this, doubtless, in the case of those in whom the perceptive faculty is less developed—a faculty, the absence or slight development of which must by no means be taken to imply a low order of intelligence, as those who have studied Galton's researches on this point will remember. Some persons always think of the years of the century or the numerals up to twenty in a particular diagram, others frame no such pictures. But the fact alluded to above is, we think, conclusive as to the point on which Vernon Lee insists—namely, that apart from appropriateness and association there is no definite and unmistakable suggestion about music any more than there is any morality in an algebraic equation. And for our own part, while we have no objection to being told about the images called up in the minds of others, we greatly resent any attempt to force upon us certain fixed pictures or sentiments, as inseparably associated with certain pieces of abstract music. It is very interesting, for example, to learn from his own letters, that Schumann discovered the whole story of "Hero and Leander" in one of his Phantasiestücke—"Die Nacht"—after he had composed it; or again, how Chopin's Funeral March reminded him of cannons buried in flowers; or again, how at a performance of the C minor Symphony, an old soldier stood up in uncontrollable excitement at the opening of the last movement, and cried out "C'est l'Empereur." But when—as happened to the present writer—a well-meaning friend appeals to one whether such and such a phrase is not typical of a pantheistic philosophy, we are fain to protest against this or any other attempt to regard music as a precise language. Such definite symbolism would be the death of music, and there can be no doubt that the mistaken interpretation put upon Wagner's theories by some of his extreme adherents—for whom, by the way, he had the heartiest contempt—would tend not a little to mislead persons as to the true function of music—namely, the expressing and illustrating those sides of our being, which can be expressed or illustrated in no other way.

The poetry of Boito's and Cimarosa's music, then, Vernon Lee is driven to conclude, resides in the very prosaic circumstance that the music is beautiful. Rather a lame and impotent conclusion, as she herself frankly admits, but one which, taken in connection with the other conclusions arrived at in the long and elaborate musical medley styled "Signor Curiazio," is worthy of due consideration and respect. The writer had been endeavouring to conjure up and recall a recent performance of "Tristan und Isolde," and along with the resultant impressions, which were chiefly those of weariness, there emerged a fragment of a phrase from Cimarosa's "Orazi," coupled with a vague sense of regret and approval. In order that her readers may fully appreciate the incongruity of Curiazio intruding himself into the company of this most tragic pair of mediæval lovers, she is impelled to give some account of the conditions of operatic performances at the time when Cimarosa wrote, in the form of an imaginary dramatic prologue to Sografi's "Le Convenienze Teatrali," a very amusing tour de force, which lets us behind the scenes of that "world of tyrannical prima donnas and coxcomb primo nomos, &c. . . . with its exquisitely trained voices, its admirably elegant music, its contempt for history, geography, and possibility." This incongruous intrusion of Cimarosa's music, Vernon Lee explains by saying "the fact that she could not possibly love or feel sorry about Tristram and Yseult, had called forth the fact that she had loved and been sorry for Curiazio." From this she is led to inquire into the reasons for her preference in the one case and indifference in the other; and finally find them in the fact that Cimarosa's music has a personality (of which more anon) and Wagner's none. Lest, however, the ardent admirers of Wagner's genius—amongst whom we enrol ourselves—should be led to imagine that Vernon Lee's disparagement is founded on mere prejudice or ignorance, we hasten to point out that in several places she speaks of the magical power of his music with an eloquence and graphic force that his votaries could hardly surpass. "We are," she says (pp 171-173), "let us say, during the performance of the marvellous garden duet, extremely moved; we are unconscious of the theatre, of the spectators, of the actors, almost of the music, and almost of our real selves; for notes, combination of notes, harmonies, melodies—all these things have disappeared, have melted away. And disappeared also has our past, our present, our future—all the things about which we think, after which we strive, all gone, forgotten. There remains, so to speak, only a something within ourselves which is vibrating, quivering, vaguely wanting, receiving, giving, hungering and thirsting, fainting and gasping, and uprising and shaking at we know not what closed gates; there remains a something outside ourselves which is sweeping across us, sending streams of anguish through the bare nerves of our soul, pouring upon them a quite heavenly balm; chilling us at one moment, and making us burn at another; shaking like an impetuous wind; rocking, submerging us, like a soft wave. Besides this, a vision, a sort of passing glorified sense of the presence of Tristram and Yseult whom we love; nay, we do not love them, we love with them. They are in us and we are in them. Love, but how? Not certainly as we love Desdemona, or Juliet, or Miranda; not even as we love some beautiful soulless statue for its more visible loveliness; not anything like that. In this there is neither sympathy with virtue nor admiration for beauty; there is merely what there is in Tristram and Yseult themselves, and by what name should we call that? As they love one another, so do we seem to love with them; the buzz of their blood is in our ears, the palpitation of every one of their arteries is throughout our own bodies, the choking of their voice is in our throats. Through ourselves runs a bodily tremor and convulsion of passion communicated by the hurrying violin phrases, the sighing horns and panting hautboys, by the throbbing (as of blood in the temples) of the basses in the orchestra, all rushing up to subside in long tremulous ripples, turned to slowly swaying waves of sound, through which, every now and then, well up the broken harp chords. Ourselves, the music, Tristram, Yseult, whither disappeared? We know not; there remains but this strange mist of passion, these narcotic fumes, in which there is the height of pain and pleasure and forgetfulness, wreathing, swirling out of the music of Wagner as out of some magic censer, rising to our brain, to numb and intoxicate." High praise this, and yet fully preparing us for the subsequent passage. Is our soul, she asks, during such a performance and as long as its spell lasts, "made stronger, keener, and more supple to deal with true and false, and right and wrong, as it would be by some written tragedy? I fear not. That passion, without object or motive, blind, if passion ever was, deaf and sterile, communicated to our soul by the mysterious power of Wagner's music, shakes and unsettles it, weakens our mental and moral muscle, making it incapable of resistance in the present, less capable of resistance in the future. If it be true that the dignity of any art in our lives may be measured by the degree to which it increases our power of coping with the difficulties and agitations to which our soul is exposed; may we not ask, if, during the performance of such music, we were suddenly put in presence of some great decision to make, or some great temptation to resist—Should we be more or less fitted to make the right choice, or take the right course, while our soul was enervated and excited with the empty visions and barren passions with which, like a subtler alcohol, such music had filled it? Let every one answer this question for himself: to me it seems to admit of but one answer." That these are pertinent questions no one can deny, and we do not propose to enter upon any discussion of them, merely remarking that the bracing and refreshing quality which Vernon Lee denies to Wagner, would be declared by his votaries to be found in the very highest degree in such a work as "Parsifal." For the present, we are concerned with Vernon Lee's treatment of the question—What is a musical individuality, and does it really exist? Music undoubtedly possesses the power "of projecting into our soul the shadowy semblance of joy, or grief, or rage, or tenderness which we have ourselves experienced." There is emotion in music, but "emotion is not he or she who feels it; emotion is not a man or a woman, it is not an individual." The personality is in the words of the libretto, not in the score of the opera. So that it would almost seem as in admiring or disliking a musical individuality, we had been criticising the non-existent. But, as Vernon Lee proceeds to show, the hows and whys of music are excessively complicated and misleading, its philosophy a perfect phantasmagoria of strange things, and its phraseology so poor, even in the simplest technicalities, that although we perceive the qualities as quite separate, we have to conceive them in the terms of other classes of things. "The characteristics of music are unknown except in music, and have no nomenclature of their own; so that we are simply reduced to applying to musical qualities the names of qualities which can have no musical existence." This is bad enough in regard to mere technicalities, but when we come to grand effects the confusion grows inextricable. We borrow, to designate the large impressions producible by music, the nomenclature of our conditions of soul. "For such combinations of notes as constitute musical identity we are simply without names," and the result of that figurative language which we are forced to use is that "the more we attempt to describe music to ourselves and to others, the more completely do we get into the habit of talking of music as having a nature which it simply has not got. . . . And hence it is that the quality of definiteness of musical form, the something which does not yet exist in Palestrina and has well nigh ceased to exist in Wagner, becomes in our mind unconsciously confused and identified with definiteness of musical personality." And this confusion is immensely enhanced by the conditions of operatic performance. "Music, words, dress, and gesture unite, and we cease to know what is what. If, then, the man or woman on the stage sings those words to music which give us a sense of clearness, of separateness from other music, . . . it must inevitably seem to us that this clearness, completeness, separateness is cognate to the moral nature of the living man or woman, to the nature of those human words; we think of it as individuality of character. . . . Thus, therefore, does musical personality, although a mere phantom, come really to exist (like many another phantom) for our fancy and our affections; thus can we feel, towards what is merely the poignancy of loveliness, a quite human kind of sympathy: we can love, and almost desire to serve on account of their beauty, what are in reality merely arrangements of melodies and harmonies, but of which we think as the heroes or heroines of Gluck, or Mozart, or Schubert." This personality or distinctness of form is possessed in a high degree by Cimarosa's music. "Curiazio," Vernon Lee continues, "is musical flesh and blood; has a musical face and eyes into which I can look; he has a musical personality. And Tristram and Yseult, I say once more, have none; are mere dim spectres confused with each other, and confused with all things about them. Why? Because the music which Wagner has composed on to the words expressive of their vicissitudes and of their feelings is, even like the music of Palestrina's great Mass, music insufficiently distinct in form; music of the infinite; music all about nothing at all; music without personality. And for this reason, therefore, the most imaginative and emotional of all composers, the man whose whole life has been one long mediation on the weirdness and pathos of mediæval romance, one constant effort to bring them home to us with his music; this man therefore has failed, where an utterly unthinking composer, or rather the grotesque world of Sograft's 'Convenienze Teatrali' has succeeded, succeeded even to the extent of sending their absurd and charming Curiazio into my mind when it should have been flooded with the thought of Tristram and Yseult." Of a truth has it been said that the mobility of a woman's mind adds to her attractiveness. How eloquent and vivid, and true and irreconcilably inconsistent are Vernon Lee's criticisms on Wagner; telling us in one passage of the mortal weariness induced in her by listening to Tristram, and in another of the intoxicating sorcery of his strains; describing the chief characters in that drama at one moment as a pair of spectral phantoms, and in another so throbbing and palpitating with life as to force us, willy nilly, to love and live with them. And how complacent is the use of the pronoun us in the last passage quoted. After all, we are not so sure but that Saint-Saëns has a good deal to justify the following protest, with which we many fitly close this paper:—"La critique musicale étant faite, non par des musiciens, mais par des littérateurs, la musique est livrée à ses pires ennemis, et tous les conseils qu'on lui donne la conduiraient à sa perte, si elle les suivent. On ne dit pas aux musiciens; soyez grands, soyez forts, soyez sublimes! mais soyez faciles à comprendre, mettez-vous à la portée du vulgaire. En ce moment même, on donne ce conseil aux compositeurs qui songent à écrire de nouveaux ouvrages pour l'Opéra: 'Pour être compositeur dramatique, il n'est nul besoin de se montrer algébriste ou chimiste. Que, avant tout, leurs œuvres soient scéniques et mélodiques, le reste leur sera pardonné s'il est besoin.'"

BY JOSEPH BENNETT.

No. XXIV.—HÉROLD (continued from page 18).

LAST month we saw the composer of "Zampa" escape from Venice without a passport and set his face towards Vienna. Five days after that bold adventure (we must remember that the Hundred Days of 1815 were in progress) he appeared at Ponteba, near the Austrian frontier, having contrived so far to elude the attentions of the most suspicious and watchful police in the world. But Hérold's greatest difficulty lay before him. He had to cross the frontier into Austria, and then make his way to the capital without knowing a word of the language. What of that? Youth is strong and hopeful; it loves danger, and finds its energies braced up by obstacles. Hérold persevered, therefore, and combining the wisdom of the serpent with the harmlessness of the dove, engaged a smuggler to convey him across the boundary line. Known to the "free-trader" in question were all the by-paths by which forbidden goods, or men, could be slipped over the frontier, and the operation would, no doubt, have been easy had not the weather made it difficult. When the two men started, at midnight, the rain descended in torrents, the roads were in a frightful state, and a river through which they had hoped to wade was found swollen and impassable. Cross that stream they must, or venture a bridge guarded by officers of the customs and police. What was to be done in the emergency? Hérold proposed swimming, but the smuggler had contracted to risk liberty, not life, and therefore declined. The bridge alone remained. It was the last card of the confederates and they determined to play it. Happily, fortune favoured them. Perhaps because of the violence of the storm, the officers were not on the alert; so, in the darkness and tumult of the elements, our two adventurers slipped past and by four o'clock in the morning had tramped several miles into the country and found shelter in a way-side house, where Hérold recompensed and dismissed his guide. From that point the young Frenchman travelled alone, sometimes on foot, sometimes in public conveyances, but always, on approaching a town or village, executing a grand turning movement to escape official attention. At Klagenfurt his troubles reached a climax. Having as usual left the diligence and performed a flank march, he found several roads leading from the town on the other side. Which was the right one the poor bewildered traveller could not ascertain. He wandered wearily about on the outskirts of the place, knocking at the doors of cottages and making signs that he wanted food and lodging. In every case came a prompt refusal. The people, taking him for a deserter or suspicious person of some sort, ruthlessly turned him away. What was to be done? In his journal we find the answer: "As pouring rain had been continuous for five days, the roads were dreadful, and I could not take a step without finding the water up to my knees. Calling up all my courage and resolving what to do, I wandered into the country looking for shelter, but finding none for an hour, when I caught sight of some boards, and dragged myself towards them. They were two or three old planks nailed together and supported by sticks. Below was a little hay, to my great delight. Behold my house; behold my bed. I looked at my watch; it was ten o'clock, and I must remain there till four in the morning. The night of May 24, 1815, will not be forgotten by me." A day and a night did Hérold roam about, dodging the police and soldiers, thankful to share a peasant's coarse food and rough bed. At last he fell in with the same public conveyance that had carried him to Klagenfurt, but in such a condition of dirt and dilapidation was the poor musician that his fellow passengers did not recognise him.

Fifteen days were spent on this painful journey, but even when Vienna was reached Hérold's troubles did not end. His position, indeed, became one of graver embarrassment. Austria was at war with France, and a Frenchman found in Vienna without a passport stood in danger of arrest and punishment as a spy. Moreover, want of the important document made useless all the letters of recommendation brought from Italy. At many a door did he knock in vain after wandering from the environs of the city, where he was thankful to find a lodging in the worst inn's worst room. Driven almost to despair, Hérold at length resolved to throw himself upon the tender mercy of Salieri—a man who had not much of that quality to spare. Accordingly he sought an interview with the composer, who, to get rid of an annoyance, passed him on to Prince Talleyrand, representative of France at the Congress of Vienna. The whilom bishop received his young countryman politely, heard what he had to say, and replied: "You have journeyed quite in French style; we will arrange your affairs." But all that Talleyrand could obtain was permission for Hérold to reside in Vienna during fifteen days. Upon this the young Frenchman quitted his dirty lodging in the suburbs and took somewhat expensive apartments on the Graben.

Of course Hérold went about hearing as much music as he could—the "Agnes Sorel" of Girowitz, the "Palmira" of Salieri, the "Bergsturtz" of Weigl, &c. He admired German art immensely, made contemptuous comparisons between it and the art of Italy, and really thought that he had found the Promised Land. He was further gratified on learning that the Austrian police would not interfere with him at the end of the fifteen days. But when Prince Talleyrand left Vienna, the clouds gathered again. Promptly came a notification from the police that Hérold must follow his distinguished compatriot, at any rate beyond the city walls. Desolation! And this, too, just when he had settled down for a long and profitable experience of the Austrian capital. Our young musician did not despair, but again invoked the aid of Salieri, into whose good graces he had contrived to worm himself, and also that of a Councillor at whose house he was in the habit of visiting. Both offered to become sureties for Hérold's good behaviour, on which they were informed that a petition for leave to reside must be drawn up and other formalities attended to. "Behold me," says the diarist, "in a droll situation. I am obliged, on the one hand, to prove that I have sufficient cash to pay my way here; on the other, to tell my director at Rome that I am dying of hunger, without which assurance he will not give me a sou."

While efforts were being made to the end of his continued residence in Vienna, Hérold took advantage of every musical opportunity that came in his way. But he was rather surprised to find that the Viennese were more disposed to enjoy French works than those of native growth. They listened to "Joconda," "Jean de Paris," "Le Nouveau Signor," and "Cendrillon," and, on reaching the end of the list began again with the utmost patience and cheerfulness. With reference to this experience, Mr. Jouvin—to whom we are indebted for these interesting details of Hérold in Vienna—has some remarks worth quoting:—

very sumptuously and then lock the door, who proudly show the appointments of the dining room to their neighbours and take their meals in the kitchen. Hérold, mad about German music on reaching Vienna, had to put up with something strongly resembling a parody on French music. This was in 1815 and so it is in 1866. At this very moment the Germans of Paris protest against the failure of 'Tannhäuser,' and the French of Vienna applaud to-day 'La Belle Hélène' and will applaud 'Barbe Bleue' to-morrow. Adolphe Adam told me one day that, in travelling through Germany to Russia, he was more surprised than flattered to see in the repertoire of the towns en route his 'Postillon' and 'Brasseur,' which had been treated with lofty condescension by Parisian criticism and relegated by it to the orchestras of tea-gardens."

Apart from being condemned to hear French operas performed by Germans, Hérold greatly enjoyed and benefited by his Vienna sojourn. He became on intimate terms with old Salieri, who told him anecdotes by the hour, dissected symphonies for him, characteristically pointing out all the defects but saying nothing about the beauties, and advising him with exceeding patience. Hérold made acquaintance also with Hummel, who charmed him not less as a man than as an artist. The young Frenchman passed an entire morning with the great pianist, and wrote in his diary: "He preluded for nearly an hour, and I was entranced. We sang a mass by him. He played to me a manuscript concerto, two fantasias, some variations; in short, anything I wished. I was very sorry to part company with him, but in a year he will visit Paris." At this time Beethoven lived in the Austrian capital, and Hérold had a letter of recommendation to him, but dared not present it, such was the reputation of the great master as one whom it might be dangerous to approach. The French musician makes one reference to him in his diary. After praising Hummel's courtesy and good nature he adds: "Beethoven is a different man. He is unhappily deaf and as fierce as his face. I have met him in society. He did not wish to play the piano, and was not pressed, because everybody knows that, if disinclined, he would not play for the Emperor of Morocco. They sometimes perform 'Fidelio' here—an opera of his which I have studied only at the piano. I shall be curious to hear it in the theatre, but the actress who plays Leonora is travelling, and, for myself, I hope soon to return to my dear and unfortunate country."

The hope just referred to had its counterbalance, for Hérold had made himself much at home in Vienna and could not endure the thought of quitting Salieri. He wrote in his diary: "How changeable is humanity. At present, while I am tranquilly residing in Vienna, I am burning with desire to leave. I have nothing to learn here in the matter of theatrical composition, or, at least, that which I can learn may be learned better in Paris. But one does not part easily from Salieri. But for him I should be now in my own country. Nearly every day they play French operas here, and I can hear them better performed in Paris." Curiously enough—yet, after all, not curiously—he began to look back with favour upon the Italian music which he had come amongst the Germans in order to escape and forget. His ideal of German music was not satisfied, and this prompted him to leave the Austrian capital. Thus he writes: "It is not that staying in Vienna wearies me, but that there is no great advantage in remaining long here. While I am satisfied to have studied German taste on leaving Italy, I see that it might be dangerous exclusively to hear this compact music which speaks always to the ear and the head and never to the soul. The modern operas which gave me greatest pleasure are those of Girowitz. The works of Weigl are masterpieces of counterpoint, but I do not find in them what I really want. The concerted pieces are excellently made, but where is the esprit of Italian music? Ah! I formerly said severe things about Italian music, and every day I more and more find out that I was wrong. True, the Italian orchestra is sometimes poor, as we say, but in what consists the worth of a composition?—in the manner of treating the ideas or in the ideas themselves? My way of looking at music has much changed in three years, and I love to think that it has not changed for the worse." Mr. Jouvin comments upon these remarks very justly: "The artist, in his leanings from Italy towards Germany and from Germany towards Italy, appeared already to understand, at twenty-four and before having written his first French opera, that an exclusive and intolerant art, which does not open its hands to the beautiful, come whence it may, which does not advance to meet it in whatever direction, is a god which cuts off his own limbs in order not to be tempted to come down from his pedestal and leave his temple. The public, in that very different from the Austrian police who harassed Hérold, do not think of asking a composer for his passport; it matters little whether he come from Paris, Vienna, or Naples; what does matter is that, in default of genius, he have talent, and that music, French, German, Italian, be, for him, before all things music. Hérold, always having a glimpse of this grand truth, did not grasp it till after many trials. At last, in writing a score, and looking for inspiration, he turned the eyes of his spirit towards Mozart, Méhul, Grétry, or Rossini. Then, the hand sure, the thought free, and throwing into the crucible of his genius the harmony of the Germans, the melody of the Italians, the esprit of the French, rejecting no one and copying no one, he could write two masterpieces, the most inspired and the most perfect—'Zampa' and 'Le Pré aux Clercs.'"

Hérold at length quitted Vienna, setting his face, in the first instance, towards Munich, and designing, staff in hand and wallet on back, to walk the whole hundred and twenty leagues. He had persuaded a Bavarian, one of his friends, to attempt this pedestrian exercise with him, and, one morning at four o'clock, the two young fellows began their tramp in high spirits. The first day they marched eighteen leagues, and, of course, exhausted themselves. The next day saw no more than twelve accomplished, and the morrow beheld them, after plodding along for a few hours, ignominiously seeking the repose and speed of a vehicle. So on the morning after that, and though, on the fifth and sixth days they, feeling ashamed of themselves, took to walking again, on the seventh they discovered that pedestrianism was not much in their line. At Lambach, therefore, the humiliated companions hired a carriage for the rest of the journey and found it very comfortable.

On reaching Munich, Hérold prepared to take another bath of German music, and rushed to a Concert given for the benefit of "a Mr. Weber, director of the theatre at Prague." The quotation is from Hérold's diary, and conclusively proves that Hérold had, at that time, heard nothing of the immortal Carl Maria. Nor, having made the acquaintance of his music, did he greatly like it. He writes: "Mr. Weber, the concert-giver of this evening, has good execution upon the piano, but it appears to me that he wants taste. In all the works of his that I have heard I cannot find a beautiful phrase. He surmounts upon the piano the most astonishing difficulties, but destitute of charm. His duet with clarinet sent everybody to sleep." Commenting upon this remarkable criticism, Mr. Jouvin endeavours, for the credit of Hérold, to cast doubt upon the identity of "a Mr. Weber" with the composer of "Der Freischütz," and suggests that the person spoken of was Dionysius Weber. But, unfortunately, this will not "hold water" for a moment. On turning to the "Life of Weber," by his son, we find that Carl Maria was in Munich at the precise time of which Hérold speaks, and that he gave a Concert on August 2, three days after the young Frenchman's arrival. "The house was crammed in every part," writes Baron Max. "The whole public listened with rapt attention to Weber's performances of his own Piano Concerto and his duet for piano and clarinet with the accomplished Bärmann. The Overture to 'Sylvana' met with the liveliest appreciation. . . . The receipts from the Concert were considerable, and on every side there were pleasure and contentment." From all this it is clear that Hérold spoke of Carl Maria, but so did Beethoven when he said "Science with him has taken the place of genius," and Fétis when he wrote: "Upset an inkstand on ruled paper and you will have the orchestral effects of Weber."

From the Munich entries in Hérold's diary, we get a glimpse of the "envious Winter." "This evening I have been presented to Mr. Winter, who is as big and as fat as when I saw him in Paris. I am sorry for him that he should be jealous even of his own pupils. I have been told that, great as he is, he is very idle and childish. He begs each person who visits him to do something for him, and he gives sacred representations at his house during Christmas. You see that great talents have their little weaknesses." From Munich, Hérold turned towards Paris, saying: "I am twenty-four years old, and have written nothing but a vile Italian Opera." So through Bâle and Nancy, and Chalons and Meux hurried our young man, full of hope for the future and determination to realise it.

Hérold reached Paris at the end of August, 1815, and after a little while obtained temporary employment at the Théâtre Italien, then ruled by Madame Catalani, who, perhaps, made him useful in the hack work of cutting and patching operas to suit the prima donna. Hérold next became Maestro al cembalo at the Opéra-Comique, but devoted most of his thought and energy to search after a good libretto. This was an anxious time. He had done nothing and there seemed no possibility of escape from a mute inglorious condition. When, therefore, disappointments continued, he was tempted to give up the struggle, and submit to a life of miserable obscurity. This state of mind is shown in his diary: "What shall I do? Do as Emmerich? * Listen to reason and find satisfaction in imitating him? I have entered upon a career in which none of Emmerich's qualities would be worth much. Frankness, boldness, a lofty standard of morals—all that has no place in our state. I even think that the opposite qualities are indispensable—falsehood, hypocrisy, miaplage are all wanted for success with us."

At this time the Duc de Berry was forming his household, and Hérold's friends strongly advised him to apply for the post of director of the music. On the other hand, Madame Catalani, who contemplated a European tour, desired to take him with her as composer-accompanist. This threw our irresolute young man into greater perplexity than ever. He wanted to stay in Paris to make good his footing there. Something had already been done to that end; to go away was to undo it. But there was an attraction in seeing men and cities, in opportunities for studying foreign art and artists. Hérold, like the proverbial donkey between two equally fragrant bundles of hay, was long in making up his mind. At length, however, as something had to be done, he threw in his lot with Catalani, influenced by Méhul on the ground that enforced idleness in Paris was working the young musician an injury, as no doubt it was. Hérold made all arrangements to start on the tour—and went not. At the last moment he was diverted by the sudden opening of a new and happier road.

During what he thought to be his last hours in Paris, Hérold visited the Favart on some matter of business and was told that a messenger from M. Boieldieu had called to say that his employer desired an interview with the Maestro al cembalo. There were two Boieldieus in Paris at the time, one being the composer, the other his brother, a music publisher. Hérold called first upon the publisher, whom he knew, naturally supposing that there was a commission of some kind on hand. But no; he was not wanted there. The young man next tried the greater man, whom he had not met for eight years. "Good morning, my friend," exclaimed the composer of "Le Caliph de Bagdad," "for a long time, without seeing you, I have sought to do you a service. At this moment I have an opera to compose, and an infernal sciatica to endure. I cannot get rid of the gout, and I count upon you to finish my work. I have done the first act; you shall write the second. What do you say? Does it suit you?" Suit him! Why here was the chance he had been waiting for, come in the very nick of time, and that so suddenly and from a quarter so unexpected that Hérold was stunned and for a while could not answer. Then he poured forth his thanks, went home and wrote in his journal:—"If ever I am ungrateful I shall indeed be guilty." Apropos, Mr. Jouvin tells how Hérold repaid a part of his debt to Boieldieu:—

"On paying a morning visit to the most popular of French composers, and finding him still in bed, Hérold, familiar with the house, wandered into the sitting room and sat down to the piano. After having extemporised, he rose, and began marching up and down the room. As he did so his feet disturbed some papers which had been torn and thrown under the composer's desk. Minims and crotchets, upon which fell a ray of light from the window, seemed to protest against the ignominious treatment they had received at the hands of the master. Hérold mechanically gathered up the paper, cast his eyes upon it carelessly, then looked with curiosity, interest, and astonishment. Under the fingers which carefully arranged the fragments, the hieroglyphic notes took form. From the hand of Hérold the manuscript passed to the desk of the piano; the crotchets and minims, their humiliation avenged by a courteous chevalier, babbled and sang under the fingers of their saviour. When Boieldieu, who had risen and dressed, entered the room, all the children of his imagination saluted their father. 'What a delightful piece!' said Hérold, rising from the piano to salute his friend. 'You have nearly made me like it,' responded Boieldieu. 'But, between ourselves and without humbug, do you really think it passable?' 'Passable! You are modest this morning. It is spirituel, melodious; in a word, charming.' 'Ma foi,' was the answer, 'that piece charming! Thanks to you, it has had a narrow escape! You found it —' 'On the floor; but I tell you that it will be praised to the skies.' Boieldieu was then working at 'La Dame Blanche,' and the masterpiece condemned by the composer, and miraculously saved by Hérold, was the Duo de la Peur."

of a royal marriage—but it gave him a lot of trouble. One air was written five times, and even the fifth effort failed, whereas, said the composer, "when I was at Naples, working for men about whom I knew nothing, and in a strange language, I never altered a note." The work was produced at the Théâtre Feydeau on the first anniversary of the battle of Waterloo, and achieved a complete success, though whether the enthusiasm of the audience was natural or in part assumed to make things pleasant for royalty, may be an open question. Hérold's own impressions of the occasion were confided, like all others, to his journal:—

"It was yesterday, Thursday, June 18, that I made my début in Paris, under the protection of Boieldieu, and this morning M. Méhul told me that I had done well not to go away. The success of 'Charles de France' was not a moment in doubt. Boieldieu's music excited enthusiasm. Mine did not displease; the air sung by Huet, 'Vive la France,' carried the piece. MM. Boieldieu, Méhul, and Nicolo assure me that I am on the right road; all the papers praise the work, and that makes yesterday the happiest day of my life. I owe all to Boieldieu."

Now we leave our young master with his foot firmly on the ladder of success.

II.

THE authorship of the names of the notes now in use is attributed to Franco of Cologne by some, to Walter Odington, an Englishman, by others. The date of the existence of Franco is given by Fétis in the eleventh, by Kieseewetter to the thirteenth centuries. Walter Odington wrote the treatise wherein he names the notes in 1220.

The large and the long probably were derived from the virga, the breve and the semibreve from the punctus. These notes sufficed for all known purposes. Their names indicate their relative duration. It was only in later years, after the time-table became a recognised institution, that special characteristics were assigned to the proportionate duration of these notes. Franco of Cologne speaks of notes as being perfect and imperfect; the term perfect being used for the number three in honour of the Trinity. The long was always perfect when followed by a long, and the breve when followed by a breve. The long preceded or followed by a breve, or a breve by a semibreve, was imperfect. This enabled the composer to write in duple or triple time at will, though as yet neither of these measures were clearly defined. The semibreve was the diminutive of the shortest note, and all written music was restricted to the use of these few characters. When the minim, which means the least, was invented, in the thirteenth or the fourteenth centuries, either by Philippus de Vitriaco or Johannes de Muris, it is not known by whom with certainty, a greater extension of rhythmic emphasis became possible, though the new notes were subject to the same rules as those which guided the old ones.

After the minim came the semi-minima, now called the crotchet because of the hook which the semiminims once possessed. Having got as far as a division of half of the least, refinement upon refinement was further extended by the introduction of the lesser semi-minim, also called the fusa or croma—in English, the quaver—from the fact that this note was only employed in embellishments as the quilisma or quaver of the voice.

The fusa was called croma, inasmuch as it represented the amount of the proportionate loss sustained by a note of superior value when it was coloured in writing. The use of coloured notes was discontinued towards the end of the fourteenth century, but the names remained. About the same time white or outline notes came into use. They were employed, in conjunction with black notes, on conditions similar to those which were attached to the use of coloured notes—namely, a loss of a third of their value when perfect, of a fourth when imperfect.

To facilitate the reading of the rhythm of music, a series of time signatures were invented, the relics of which still embarrass musical students. Perfect, that is to say triple time, was represented by a circle, $\bigcirc$, sometimes with the figure three added, $\bigcirc_3$; sometimes with a semi-circle and a figure three, thus $\bigcirc_3$. Imperfect time was shown by a semi-circle ($\smile$), by the same figure with the number two, and by a circle with the figure two, $\bigcirc_2$.

These all represent different degrees of speed in the proportion of $\bigcirc$ $\smile$ $\bigcirc_2$ and $\bigcirc_3$. In these latter figures may be recognised the sign employed in old music. The stroke shows diminution of value, increase of speed. The greater prolation as it was called was indicated by the addition of the dot to the time-sign, thus: $\bigcirc \cdot$ for perfect or triple time. In course of practice this dot was transferred to the notes of the lesser prolation, so making two to possess the value of three, or as it is now taught, the dot after any note increases its value by one-half, which is the same thing in different words, and things that are equal to the same thing are equal to one another. This dot is still called on the Continent the "point of perfection," thus showing its origin and connection with the ancient plan of the time table.

Time of four minims in a bar shown by the addition of the bar to the semi-circle, and called alla breve, therefore did not mean time of the breve, the musical sign, but time of the shortest duration, that is to say, quick time. There were no marks of expression or words employed to denote pace, all was done by means of certain modifications of existing and recognised signs. Thus, when a double line was drawn through the $\bigcirc$, it meant that the time was alla capella, the quickest of all times, not as is very frequently understood and taught in the present day, the time for church or chapel music of dignity and solemnity, vocal music unaccompanied by instruments, but a skipping time, the time of the goat in fact. If the sign was reversed, $\bigcirc$, it signified "that you must double the swiftness of the ordinary time."

Another method of expressing the reduction of the value of a note, was by the process called evacuatio, literally an emptying. Notes were deprived of a third of their value by drawing them in outline, thus $\diamond$ was made $\diamond$. The first was called semibrevis plena et perfecta, the full and perfect semibreve, of the value of three; the second was called semibrevis vacua et imperfecta, of the value of two. Other notes were treated in like manner, and the simplicity of the arrangement, by which the necessity of calculating the value of the note according to its relative position as to those which preceded or followed it was avoided, brought it into general use. Both kinds were at first used together, and afterwards the evacuated notes replaced the full ones. Another interesting fact associated with these old signs of prolation will be found in connection with the character employed to denote the prolongation of sound in what is called the pause. This sign is represented thus $\circ$, and it needs no extraordinary keenness of perception to see that it is only the sign of the greater prolation inverted. It may be accepted as a further proof of the tenacity with which old customs cling to modern uses. It will appear strange to those who are only acquainted with musical characters in the forms now issued from the press, when it is said that the signs for the clefs are only modifications of the letters of the alphabet, which were originally employed for the same purpose—namely, that of indicating the pitch.

The bass clef is the letter F, the tenor and alto clefs the letter C, and the treble clef is the letter G.

The F and the C clefs have been in longest use in ecclesiastical music, no others being found in the old manuscripts anterior to the time of Palestrina. The treatises of the fifteenth century show five different clefs, the Gamma on the lowest line, the F, the C, the G, and the D. This practice was continued for more than a hundred years, as may be seen in the "Erotemata Musicae" of Lossius, published in 1570, and other works about the same period. Out of the fancies of the theorists a more definite form for each of the two most common clefs was adopted. The G clef was later in coming to a settled form. The earliest known example of its appearance in a shape nearly approaching its present form is to be found in the "Compendium Musicae," written by Lampadius in 1573. There it stands upon the second line. Lulli placed the clef upon the first line for his violin parts, hence it came to be called, in that position, the French violin clef. It is to be found in scores as late as the end of the eighteenth century.

In a work by Christopher Demantius, called "Isagoge Artis Musicae" (1636), the clef is placed upon the third line. This is a needless trouble, inasmuch as the like series of sounds can be represented by the C clef on the first line. The treble clef was called the G sol re ut clef, the name being a legacy of the nomenclature of the Guidonian hexachordal system. The letters G and S were united in the clef in most music written as late as the first half of the eighteenth century. The present form adopted is a sort of glorification of those letters. The same shape is adopted in printed books for the sign of the word "and," this convenient arrangement being only a modification of the letters "et," which means the same thing.

So long as musical utterances and composition were restricted to the scales formed on the Guidonian system, the number of characters required in music was small; such modulations as were made were confined in their forms to the accepted rules. These admitted of only the most rudimentary transitions into the dominant or the subdominant. For these a single sharpened note was required. This was represented by a change of the shape of the note on the fourth degree of the scale, when the F clef was employed. This note is, as all are aware, represented by the letter B. The rounded B, or B rotundum of the Gothic character, was changed to the squared B, or B quadratum; the rounded B became the general sign for a flat (b), the squared B ($\sharp$) for the natural, or, in the case of an already natural note raised half a tone, for a sharp.

The French still call the natural "bécarre," and the flat "bémol," this latter term meaning the same as "B rotundum" or "molle," the softened or rounded B.

There is a still more curious and interesting derivative employed by the Germans. They call B flat, B; and B natural, H. The former from the "B rotundum" or B flat, the latter from the "B quadratum," which is almost identical in appearance with the Gothic ($\sharp$) h.

The rebus which Bach formed of his own name, by writing one note on two staves crossed, and heading each staff with a different clef, as well as the fugues he wrote upon the subject formed by the notes, will show the freedom this added syllable allowed. Schumann also composed six fugues on the name of Bach, as well as other pieces upon the name of Abegg, formed out of the letters of the scale, an exercise of ingenuity of a most playful and good humoured character. The introduction of the character called a sharp, as representing some note higher than a natural, became necessary when the trammels of the old ecclesiastical modes were abandoned for a freer style of writing. There is no doubt but that performers altered the melodies at discretion by the application of sharps or flats in singing, so that composers, in defence of their own intentions, became constrained to write the actual intervals they desired to have performed. The natural and the flat were already to hand, as it were, and the notes intended to be made sharp were marked with a cross, and the process was called "diesis," from the Greek. The Germans still call the sharp "kreuz," the French "dièse." The English use the word sharp both as a noun and as an adjective. The cross employed was originally a cross "saltire," or St. Andrew's cross, but there is a singularity in the use of the sign which cannot be traced to a logical origin. There are writers who profess to see in this sign for the double sharp the representative of the Greek "komma," which is less than a semitone. The modern sharp is a double cross ($\sharp$), the double sharp is represented by a single cross in the old form (X), yet this is the sign called "doppel kreuz" in Germany. The old method of writing the sharp (X) is more in conformity with the ancient use.

At first these "signs of alteration" were written as they were required in the course of the pieces. Afterwards they were inserted at the commencement. Nearly all the music which was not set in the ecclesiastical modes, when the armature, as the signature was called, was not required, was confined in its tonality to the natural, the first sharp, or the first flat key. The peculiar untuned system of tuning instruments with key-boards or frets hindered the excursions into remote keys. All scales requiring more than two sharps or flats were regarded as extreme keys, and composers, if they had a fancy to write their music in such tonalities, made a concession to popular prejudices by employing one flat or sharp, as the case may be, less than the key required, inserting the alteration as if by accident. Hence arose the term accidental alteration, when modulation was effected. The signs by which such changes were brought about were, by an easy transition, called "accidentals."

The invention of the time-table gave to notes a definite relative value. The names by which they were called at first served to distinguish their duration, as is sufficiently obvious in the terms long, large, minim, &c. The extension of the divisions of time by the introduction of the semi-minim, the fusa, and the semi-fusa, called the ingenuity of the mediæval musicians into further exercise. The minim was represented by the sign $\downarrow$, the semi-minim by $\downarrow$ or $\downarrow$, the latter being also called a croche or crochet from the hook attached to it. In the present day there are books of instruction which gravely state that the crotchet is so called from the hook; but there is no hook, and so young people who desire conscientiously to reconcile their observation with their teaching, naturally get confused between the crotchet and the quaver, and if they question the propriety of the term, are told that the hook refers to the shape of the crotchet rest. With this explanation they are compelled to be satisfied, even though they see no difference in the forms of the quaver or the crotchet rest, the difference being in the position only.

The note of the quaver duration was anciently called a fusa from its shape, ϕ . The term was taken from the Latin word fusus, which means a spindle, the note being assumed to be spindle-shaped.

The addition of hooks to the stem of a note indicated diminution, and the manner in which these hooks or tails were sometimes written, B , shows the continuation into remote time, and the use of the old neumata. The rests, or characters which indicated silence, have been shown to be derived from that source.

The names of the notes as employed in England are scarcely so logical as they might be. There is, among notes which are, it is true, rarely employed in modern music, a long which is less than a large. The standard of extended duration is the breve, which, if its name means anything, ought to express the "short note." But there is a minim, lesser than the short, it is true; but not, as the term would signify, the ultimatum of brevity. There is a crotchet without a hook, a quaver which has a steady recognised value in time.

The Germans are more consistent in their nomenclature. They call the semibreve whole note, the minim half note, the crotchet quarter note, and so on. The French musicians of the present time give their notes names derived from their appearance. The semibreve is "une ronde," the minim "une blanche," the crotchet "une noir," the quaver "une croche" (hooked), and the sub-divisions of the quaver are twice or thrice hooked, as the case may be. These names do not imply any relation to the time-table as do the German names, but they are less confusing than the English terms, though neither show much connection with former uses.

In German a like practice is observed, as zweitelpause, viertelpause, achtelpause, &c., for minim, crotchet, or quaver rest. The French names are more poetical. The rests beginning with that of the semibreve are called pause, demi-pause, soupir, demi-soupir, &c. The pause and the half-pause are intelligible and business-like, but the sigh and the half-sigh speak of a condition of performance more or less restricted in its sentimental expression.

The words "rhythm" and "measure" were at one time synonymous. In mediæval music, the rhythmic periods were separated by a point, or the sign V , called a "presa." This answered the same purpose as the modern bar in marking a period, or the valuation of the accent. In the places where we now insert bars to divide the measure were marked points or double points, as the signs for the strong accent, upon the syllable which corresponded to the commencement of a bar. The use of bars in music is quite of modern practice, considering the antiquity of the science. The regular recurrence of bars, such as now distinguishes every piece of music, was a matter which did not trouble the musicians until near to the end of the seventeenth century.

That which we now call "measure" was never indicated by any particular sign in the music of the mediæval period. Each note had a definite recognised value calculated according to its relation to the "breve," which was also called "a time." The signs of "prolation," which showed the pace, were sometimes inserted, sometimes omitted. The music of the Italian and Flemish madrigals, of Clement Marot's Psalms, and of other works printed in the sixteenth century had no bars.

Even so late as the year 1686 bars were used only in the same manner as stops are employed in writing, to mark the end of a subordinate sentence, the double bar serving as the period.

In the Anthems and Services of Dr. Croft, Dr. Greene, and Charles King, still in use in the Anglican Church, which were published before the year 1760, the music is divided by bars which contain an unequal number of notes of the same character, sometimes two, four, six, eight, or more minims in a bar.

Sometimes the bar only extended partially over the stave, especially in church music; this was intended as a sign for the whole choir together to draw breath. "The two great bars were counted as the most efficacious contrivance that could be thought on to remedy all the cacophonies and other contrarieties in the voices of the singers, who without them could not guess when to rest."

The tunes in Playford's "Dancing Master," published in 1651, have no bars; but other secular music, songs and so forth, of the same period, are barred in regular stated division as according to present practice. The "Ayres and Dialogues" of Henry Lawes, published in 1653, are properly barred, while the "Choice Psalmes put into Musick for Three Voyces," by William and Henry Lawes, published in 1648, are without bars. The inference derived from observation of the manner of writing and printing music at this and at later dates, is that bars were the signs of secularity. Even in the present day the special Gregorian music is printed without bars, and it is a singular fact that the best performance of church music written before the end of the seventeenth century is effected when the primary accents of the bars into which it is now divided are not emphasised with any degree of strength. One of the earliest examples of the use of bars is to be found in the "Musica Instrumentalis" of Agricola, published in 1529, where the examples are written upon a single stave of ten lines. The parts are placed one above the other on the same stave with bars drawn from top to bottom. This was the usual custom in writing an instrumental piece. "Frescobaldi's Toccate, canzone versi d'Hinni Magnificat; Gagliardi, Correnti, et altri Partite di Cimbalo et Organo," printed as late as the year 1637, have a stave of eight lines. The instrumental pieces in "Parthenia," published in 1611, are written on two staves of six lines each, with the bars running through the twelve lines. The lines of the stave were also called "rules," a term still employed by printers, and the making of the notes was called "pricking," hence the term "prick-song" employed by the Elizabethan dramatists to describe written or printed music. The process of drawing the perpendicular lines through the rules was called the "scoring," as the drawing of parallel lines is still so called. Hence the term "score" for a piece in which lines are drawn through two or more staves. Other European nations call a score a "partition," because the music is represented in divisions made by the vertical lines.

I.—NEW MUSIC.

I THINK that one can gauge the musical qualities of a person very correctly by the amount of interest he takes in new music. The musician who has a real love for his art is always eager to know what are the latest developments, the newest phases of musical thought, and he scans the works of every new composer with keen interest, so as to avoid the risk of missing a stray pearl in the quantities (alas!) of dreary mediocrity that now encumber the world. Even when he knows that there will be no gem to be found, still there is a joy in wading through the rubbish heaps; in fact, it is necessary to survey them in order to know the present level of taste. The non-musician, or he who has only slight claims to be called musical, on the other hand, has a positive reluctance to encounter new ideas, amounting sometimes to a deep-rooted prejudice against them which only long familiarity can remove. The two attitudes of mind are sometimes spoken of as Liberal and Conservative but quite wrongly; they have no analogy with the principles to which those names are applied. One may be a perfect Conservative in art—that is, one may hold that classical form is absolutely vital and Wagner an abomination—and yet look and hope for fresh developments; one may be the wildest of Radicals, swearing by Liszt, Dräsecke, and the other impressionists, and yet refuse to listen to music of any other school. A profound musician may believe that Beethoven has said the last word, but none the less will he always lust after new music. A slightly musical person may passionately admire Berlioz, yet none the less will every new work, even by his favourite composer, be a stumbling-block to him. I do not wish to decry England in favour of Germany; indeed, it would be unjust to do so in the present day; but I cannot help remembering what a difference there was between the Conservatorium pupils and those of the Royal Academy in my student days. The English youths seemed to be acquainted with no music—to be sure, their opportunities for hearing orchestral or operatic works were few and far between—but outside the actual pianoforte pieces they were learning, they seemed to care to know scarcely anything, while the German lads took delight in reading vast quantities of scores, which they moved heaven and earth to procure. From Bach to Wagner, all was hungrily devoured, and the conversation between students always teemed with enquiries as to whether you had seen Tschaikowski's Concerto, Rheinberger's Symphony, or Bargiel's Sextet. To this large range of study and extended experience must be partly attributed the great depth and nobility of German as compared with French and Italian—and, till recently, English—music. I cannot better exemplify the ignorance of English students than by stating that in setting the examination papers on Musical Form for one of our public institutions I have at different times demanded an analysis of the form of any one of Mendelssohn's Songs without Words, any one of Chopin's Nocturnes, any one of Schumann's short pianoforte pieces, Beethoven's Pastoral and Eroica Symphonies, Mendelssohn's Italian Symphony and "Ruy Blas" Overture. Incredible as it may seem, no candidate has ever described one of these pieces correctly, few have attempted to do it. So much for our English education! I do not for one moment say that the German system will produce more great composers than the English; education only teaches people to enjoy, not to create. But when a genius comes it is desirable that he should know as much as possible of the ideas of his predecessors and contemporaries, if only that he may not waste his time in saying what has been said before. Ah, what joy it was, after the uninteresting productions of the post-Schumann school had wearied one's brain to death, after one had turned in disappointment from Brahms, from Jensen, Kirchner, all these men whose music never advanced one step towards heaven, to suddenly come upon a man who opened an unsuspected door, and displayed before us a new and delightful vista! Its beauty showed that it led in the right direction. New music, indeed! Novelties of melody, of harmony, of rhythm—alloyed sometimes, it must be admitted, with plenty of old second-hand matter. Novelty of every kind, even down to the writing for chorus, a department in which one would have sworn that novelty was impossible. The final fugue of Dvorák's "Stabat Mater," the "Corpse-candle" chorus in the "Spectre's Bride," the opening chain of choruses in "Ludmila," all these are emphatically new as well as beautiful. The modern Germans have sought to explore an exhausted vein; they have followed Schumann's path to where it has become choked with full chords and masses of sound. Harmony, harmony, and always harmony! No feeling at all for rhythm as a means of beauty, and therefore weak and emasculated melody—such is the German school of to-day. Look, though, at the other countries! Russia and Poland are producing music with vitality in it. Tschaikowsky and Noskowski have both got the divine spark; the Overture "Das Meerage" and the vocal Mazurkas of the latter composer are emphatically new. Rubinstein, Moszkowski, and several other "owskis," however, continue to serve us up réchauffée of Chopin, and do not understand what novelty means. Hungary and Bohemia teem with promising young musicians, but the national flavour of their music is too strong, as a rule, for English palates. Italy has lost her distinctive school of melody, and, having nothing else to fall back upon, produces curious combinations of French and German peculiarities; while, if you look beneath the surface, the music is absolutely worthless. French writers are, as a rule, sad slaves to their one god, Gounod; but I have lately remarked one who is producing genuinely new music. This is, singular to state, a lady, Mlle. Chaminade. She is probably the first of her sex who has been accused of originality, but a single glance at her six Etudes (Op. 35) will prove the truth of the charge. There is, perhaps, most boldness and freshness in the present-day composers of the Scandinavian countries, generously fostered as their talents are by the wisest government in the world. Hamerik, Sjögren, Svendsen, and Grieg have all a clearness and manliness of expression that is marvellously refreshing after the dulness of the Kirchner-Hoffmann school. Grieg! there is breezy sound in the very name. The man who cannot for his life write an extended composition, but who, within his limits, the narrow limits of the Lied form, can work absolute miracles. Out of about seventy songs which he has written there is scarcely one that has not some absolute and delicious novelty in it. Whether it be a dainty Folk-melody like—or a passionate love poem like "Jeg elsker dig!" or "Det første Møde," there is a complete sense of novelty pervading the music (and we may say the words as well, for Grieg's choice of poems is exquisite). Grieg is especially great at getting a surprising effect of harmony at the end or climax of a song; for instance, where in "The swan" he suddenly jumps from a dominant 6-4 in D flat to a similar chord in F, or in "By the riverside," where he uses the minor chord of the dominant in the final close. In the Coda of one of his latest and best songs, entitled "Ragna"

(not in the collected editions), he has the following daring progression:—

This last cadence would have been a hard nut to crack for our deeply mourned late Cambridge professor, but its beauty places it beyond criticism. Yes, if the tons of music which are poured forth from the publishers only contained every year one gem like the "Reisemjnder," or the latest of the "Lyrische Stückchen," one would feel amply repaid for wading through them.

Now what about England? Is our much-abused country, which produces as much new music as any other, really keeping up to date and climbing towards new heights in the Parnassian Alps? For obvious reasons, this is a matter which it would not become me to discuss; but I may express a general opinion that the English composers are scarcely, like the fish in the "Arabian Nights," "doing their duty." Enormous strides have been made during the last few years; we are getting over our feeble tendency to echo Mendelssohn; we are now passing through the same phase of artistic flabbiness as the Germans, with this difference—our native works show a continual improvement, theirs a continual falling off. If we only keep au courant with the real men of progress, and try to enlarge the scope of our sympathies, we English composers undoubtedly have a bright musical future before us (I don't mean in any worldly sense, of course); but up to the present we have only made the first steps towards that future. I hesitate to mention names, but there can surely be little offence in declaring, as a personal conviction, that the best piece of English art up to the present date is Dr. Hubert Parry's "Blest pair of sirens." To call this work new, in the sense just applied to Grieg and Dvorák, would be incorrect. Novelty in that sense our English composers have not yet attained to, but at least they are striving to cast off their allegiance to the moribund schools of Mendelssohn and Schumann. That step once completed, they have to found a distinctive national style, to which end they should study the folk music of their own country, and strive to imbue themselves with its spirit. Haydn, Mozart, and Beethoven were all the outcome of the folk-song of Germany and Austria; Dvorák and Grieg reflect the national melodies of their respective countries; and what land has a more precious inheritance of tunes than England? Let "more light" be our first motto; "new paths" our second. It is only by cultivating a craving for new music that we shall get to produce new music. F. C.

THAT music is gradually asserting itself as a powerful additional attraction in a house intended to accommodate boarders can be proved by a perusal of the many advertisements in the daily papers from establishments of this kind. They may be elegantly furnished, pleasantly situated, and low rented; but the magic word "piano"—although often commercially coupled with "gas" or "garden"—is evidently considered an almost irresistible supplementary inducement, especially to young and unmarried men who are fond of having "a little music in the evening" without wandering from their home. The bare announcement that there is an instrument in the house, however, conveys no idea as to who is expected to play upon it; and recently, therefore, we find that this little difficulty has been foreseen and provided for by the substitution of the words "musical society," which of course means not only that a "piano" will be found, but that it will not remain a mere piece of furniture in the drawing-room, even if the incoming boarder be not himself a performer. It would certainly be thought that any man surrounded by all these comforts ought to make himself supremely happy; but the following advertisement (which is too good to be abbreviated) from a morning contemporary shows us that occasionally a musical lodger is more exacting than is usually reckoned upon: "Half board (solid breakfast and cold supper) for gentleman, with dog. Between Strand and Embankment preferred. Musical society. Spring mattress." We might undoubtedly at first consider that the "spring mattress" had some connection with the "cold supper" for which the advertiser stipulates before retiring to rest; but, following immediately upon the demand for "musical society," it is more reasonable, perhaps, to imagine that if the evening performances should call up pleasurable sensations he believes that he can thus prolong them in his dreams; and if they should unfortunately prove a "bane," that the "antidote" is immediately before him.

THE movement which will soon result in the restoration of the Gloucester Cathedral organ, at a cost of £1,000, was started with no great hope of success. Again and again it had been represented that the work was necessary, and should be undertaken; but the Cathedral is poor—its income being derived from land—and the trade of the neighbourhood has touched a very low point of depression. This state of things made even those most concerned take a desponding view of the prospects of raising so considerable a sum. At last, however, they plucked up heart of grace, issued an appeal for funds, and discovered that they had been pessimists without cause. Within a few days more than half the sum was promised, among the earliest to respond being residents in the city and neighbourhood, like Mr. W. P. Price, the Dean, some of the Canons, and the Bishop; others connected with the county by birth, like Mr. Joseph Bennett; and sympathisers with the low estate of an historic instrument, like Messrs. Novello and Co. No doubt the balance of the amount required to meet Mr. Willis's estimate will soon be forthcoming and the work be put in hand. Mr. Willis proposes to place the keyboard at the side, so that the performer can command both choir and nave. The present stops, some of them very beautiful, will be utilised as far as possible, and it is intended to deal very tenderly with the fine old case. We understand that the case of the choir organ, which occupies the front of the screen on the choir side, will not be touched. It is an excellent example of the later years of the sixteenth century (1579); the date of the great organ case is 1670. We believe that the prompt and hearty response made to the appeal of the Cathedral authorities is not unconnected with appreciation of their enterprise in establishing the performances of sacred music, now running successfully through their second season.

It must not be supposed that the provincial press enjoys a monopoly of critical ineptitude. Mr. Gaul's cantata "Ruth" was recently performed at the Church of the Holy Trinity, Haverstock Hill, and from the notice which appeared in the St. Pancras Gazette of December 8 we extract the following coruscations:—"Everyone who knows anything about music"—so runs one passage—"will admit what difficulty a composer has to invent new matter, and how easy it is to drift from originality; but with this highly gifted musician no such difficulty arose, and listening to this charming realistically operatic work, one could not help feeling the individuality of the original characters in the story. This may in a great measure result from the graphic way with which both soloists and chorus did their work; one and all seemed to have the identical idea of the composer's thoughts." Of one of the soloists we read that his "delicate baritone blended with that delightful Italian tremolo quality for which he is so distinguished; but we of course expect such artistic merit from so old and experienced a chorister." In another column of the same publication occurs an account of a Concert given at a meeting of a local Primrose League Habitation, in which we learn that the gentleman who presided at the piano, "in response to an encore, gave a short sleight of hand entertainment, winning great applause for his marvellous skill with a half-crown piece." This opens up quite a new vista in the future, and may be the beginning of a fresh departure in the annals of the "encore nuisance." Imagine Dr. Richter responding to an imperative re-demand by dancing the csardas, or Mr. Lloyd turning Catherine wheels in answer to repeated recalls to the platform!

It is said that we must go away from home if we wish to hear news. This is particularly the case with the paragraphs relating to England which occasionally appear in American newspapers. Thus we read as a prominent item of news frequently repeated in various papers, that Lavallée is in London, attending the great memorial convention. "What is the great Convention and who is Lavallée?" Londoners may pause to ask. Again we learn that London has 425 music-halls with a total seating capacity of 200,000; about 75,000 more than its sixty theatres, so that a natural conclusion would be that the music-hall is the popular form of music with the British public. So it would reasonably be, but we in London would like to know where the theatres and music-halls are situated. We should like to know also how can a music-hall be a popular form of music? Again we read that Mr. H. T. Cowden, the celebrated composer, is to succeed Sir Arthur Sullivan as Conductor of the Philharmonic Society. We have never heard of the gentleman, but we offer him our congratulations upon his appointment, and our respectful submission to the Philharmonic Society in having made choice of a celebrated composer of whom no one has ever heard.

THE ingenuity of advertisers in the present day cannot fail to strike the observant reader of the newspapers and other publications. The story of the tradesman who was disappointed because the mat-maker in weaving the word "Salve" had forgotten to state whose salve it was, is only equalled by another relating to a great advertising firm who gravely offered a celebrated novelist a thousand pounds if he would incidentally mention their peculiar class of goods in one of his serials, a story which is oft repeated and widely believed. Taking note of the fact that the short paragraph is most likely to be read by the busy-minded, the reader is beguiled into perusing the tempting little anecdotes until his senses are shocked by the discovery that he has been trapped by an advertisement. It is a little disappointing, it must be confessed, to find that some such story as a battle between an elephant and a baby, suddenly resolves itself into a statement showing that the former was discomfited and soothed into placidity by the application of a penny packet of tooth powder, prepared only by Messrs. Brush and Turnapenny, which the toothless one happened to have in his cradle.

The insidious advertiser has found his way into the body of the programme books of operas, recitals, concerts, and entertainments. It is no uncommon thing now to find one's nerves highly shocked by the violent antithesis caused by the cross-readings in books of words of otherwise respectable undertakings. The combination of light and misleading is somewhat embarrassing.

THE article on Edvard Grieg, which appears in another part of our present issue, will be read with none the less interest because the Norwegian composer is expected to visit England in connection with the performance of one of his works at a Philharmonic Concert, and also to be present at the forthcoming Birmingham Festival. Our notice of Grieg may help to invest him with an added personal interest, but, in any case, a cordial welcome awaits the musician from the North. England has not always been pleased to see the "hardy Norseman," but times have changed. He comes now with the music of the song-bird, not the hoarse croak of the raven.

WE have several times quoted from provincial newspapers remarkable specimens of musical criticism. Unfortunately curiosities of this kind are not to be found solely in local journals. In a recent number of a musical paper published in London we meet with the following exquisitely comic notice of a performance at one of the concerts given by the National Society of Professional Musicians:—"On Thursday evening (January 5th) Dr. Swinnerton Heap's Sonata in B flat, for pianoforte and clarinet, was played by the composer and Mr. Lazarus, who, I presume, 'read' in C, as he always uses a B flat instrument."

OUR readers will learn with regret that Dr. Stainer has decided to resign his office as Organist of St. Paul's Cathedral. His sight, which has been for many years imperfect, was much injured by an accident some time back, and he now feels the exertion of reading music a great strain which seriously impairs his general health. He has therefore been advised, and wisely intends acting upon that advice, to relinquish a portion of his work. He will retain his appointment in the Education Department, but will leave London and reside in Oxford.

THE Paris correspondent of the Times, who not long ago distinguished himself by reporting that Mlle. Clotilde Kleeberg had performed a Symphony of Beethoven, has chronicled, in the issue of the 23rd ult., a remarkable incident which occurred at one of the Lamoureux Concerts. The audience were so delighted at the performance of the Pastoral Symphony that they insisted on its repetition. Of a truth, M. Blowitz is inimitable.

SACRED HARMONIC SOCIETY.

ROSSINI'S "Moses in Egypt" was the work offered to the patrons of this Society in St. James's Hall on the 19th ult., and a considerable audience gathered to enjoy the luscious melodies of the "Swan of Pesaro." When Sir Michael Costa, and the directors of the old Society, brought out "Mosé" as an Oratorio in Exeter Hall, few who watched the experiment anticipated more than a passing succès d'estime. There was a natural idea that the music would be found too old-fashioned for the taste of the present day, and too light for association with a sacred story. Doubtless it so appeared to many, but upon the mass of amateurs the power of beautiful and flowing tune exerted an influence that has kept "Moses in Egypt" in the active repertory of the Sacred Harmonic Society from that time till now. We are far from complaining of its popularity, whatever we may think of the music as adapted to the illustration of the story. There are charm and beauty in the work, and where such qualities are found the eclectic amateur sees that which should not be wholly rejected because at variance with the fashion of the moment. The performance, conducted by Mr. W. H. Cummings, was, on the whole, adequate to the general demands of the theme, though not free from blemish. Both orchestra and chorus discharged their task with obvious relish and considerable success, while the soloists, who in "Moses" are of unusual importance, endeavoured to take the utmost advantage of an opportunity which, as vocalists and having regard to the nature of the music, they could not but prize. Decided successes, of the highest order, were made by Miss Anna Williams and Mr. Edward Lloyd, upon whom the chief responsibility fell. They were repeatedly applauded. The other solos were entrusted to Miss Hilda Wilson, Messrs. Wade, Newth, Bridson, Burgon, and Watkin Mills, all of whom exerted themselves more or less to the general advantage of the performance.

ROYAL ALBERT HALL CHORAL SOCIETY.

ON the 19th ult. the Choral Society connected with the Albert Hall gave a performance of the work which in France is known as the "Damnation de Faust," and in England is called by a shorter and less emphatic name. Berlioz's Legend enjoys great favour under Mr. Barnby's auspices. Whenever given it attracts a large audience, whose appetite for the story and the music seems to be stimulated by indulgence. The reason is very obvious. "Faust" is fascinating, and its performance at the Albert Hall invariably good. Regarding what was done on the last occasion by the orchestra and chorus, there is no need to say much. Mr. Barnby and his well-trained force of singers and players long ago completed their mastery of the work, and by no organisation could the concerted pieces be better given. We sometimes wish that it were possible to transfer all the executants to the Trocadéro, and show the countrymen of Berlioz how "ces insulaires" can interpret the genius they themselves so long failed to understand. The solos were taken by Madame Nordica, Mr. Banks, Mr. Henry Pyatt, and Mr. Henschel, and gave much satisfaction, though it was felt by many that the representative of Marguerite laid herself out too strongly for dramatic effects that are properly beyond the scope of concert-room work. The stage and the platform are distinct things, having different regulations, and to intrude the first upon the second is idle, because the result can only be ludicrous. Madame Nordica has no need to support herself in this fashion. She is an excellent singer, and with her expressive vocalisation audiences are quite content. The new tenor, Mr. Banks, made a step forward by his rendering of Faust's music. He has yet faults to amend and mannerisms to get rid of. This done, his fine voice and artistic feeling will serve him, if properly used, to the attainment of a high position. Mr. Henschel gave a vigorous and picturesque reading of the music allotted to Mephistopheles. He has the whole thing, so to speak, at his fingers' ends, and nothing was wanting to the expression of the Tempter's words. Regarding the technical merit of Mr. Henschel's singing it is needless to speak. Both the Serenade and Flea song were encored. Mr. Barnby conducted a performance which was fully up to the average of the Society's achievements.

LONDON SYMPHONY CONCERTS.

THESE performances were resumed on Wednesday afternoon, the 4th ult., when the audience was exceptionally large. This result may have been partly due to the eagerness of amateurs for the resumption of musical work after the Christmas holidays, but there is reason to believe that numbers of young piano students attended to hear Mr. Charles Hallé play the so-called "Emperor" Concerto in E flat. Beethoven's greatest work for piano and orchestra admits of many varied readings, but the purely classical performance of Mr. Hallé is by far the best for a pupil to "mark, learn, and inwardly digest." The esteemed artist has never played the Concerto with greater purity of style than on this occasion. Mr. Henschel's orchestra is not always irreproachable, but it was at its best in Mendelssohn's Scotch Symphony, a work that will hold its own in the estimation of English music lovers in spite of all changes of fashion. Dvorák's comic opera "The Peasant, a Rogue," is an early work. But it has an extremely fresh and spirited prelude, and the themes are strongly national in character. It is difficult to understand why Brahms should have orchestrated the accompaniments to Schubert's songs "Memnon" and "Geheimes." Granting the cleverness of his work, we are still constrained to ask cui bono? Miss Marguerite Hall sang the Lieder with good expression, but the frame almost obscured the picture.

The scheme of the eighth Concert, on Tuesday evening, the 10th ult., embraced a wide space in musical chronology, the composers represented being Rameau, Monsigny, Beethoven, Berlioz, and Liszt. Experience shows, however, that mixed programmes are not often attractive to the public, and the audience on this occasion was of rather slender proportions. The most interesting item was Liszt's "Todtentanz," a series of variations for piano and orchestra on the old ecclesiastical chant "Dies Irae." This extraordinary work had only been heard once before in London—namely, at a Concert in aid of the Royal Normal College in 1878, when Dr. Hans von Bülow was the Conductor. It was suggested to the composer by Holbein's celebrated "Dance of Death," each of the variations illustrating one of the pictures. Thus we have "the sober, earnest man, the light-hearted youth, the scoffing sceptic, the praying monk, the hardy soldier, the child at play," &c., all of whom fall a prey to the inevitable scythe of death. It is of course permissible to assert that the realism is at times too painful, but no one can deny Liszt's masterly treatment of his subject-matter. The variations differ as much as possible from one another, but through them all is heard the stern theme reminding the hearer of the ultimate fate of humanity. The fourth variation—in canonic form, it may be remarked—is from another composer, C. F. Weitzmann, of Berlin, and was added by Liszt in 1880. The pianist on the present occasion, as in 1878, was Mr. Fritz Hartvigson, who was warmly welcomed on his return to public life after a very prolonged indisposition. He mastered the enormous difficulties of the work with apparent ease. Berlioz's Overture "King Lear," which opened the Concert, was composed in his early and most extravagant days. It is full of character and contains some effective episodes, notably the melodious second subject. A tolerable performance of Beethoven's Symphony in D, No. 2, was given, and Mrs. Henschel was deservedly applauded for her artistic delivery of Rameau's air "Rossignols amoureux," with flute obbligato by Mr. Svendsen.

An equally eclectic programme was provided at the ninth Concert, on the afternoon of the 18th ult. The central feature was Brahms's early Serenade in D (Op. 11), a work allowed to fall into neglect since the composer began to write Symphonies. We are told by Dr. Deiters, Brahms's biographer, that his works Op. 1 to 10 represent the outcome of youthful daring and extravagance, and that he then allowed himself a period for study, repression of his exuberant imagination, the acquirement of artistic moderation, &c., and that the Serenade in D may be regarded as the first fruits of this wholesome mental exercise. It may be so, for though it cannot be said that Brahms has always kept his fertile fancy within the bounds of moderation in his later works, the Serenade is noteworthy throughout for lucidity of style and chaste expression. The themes are for the most part simple and tuneful, and their development perfectly easy to follow. In two of the six movements the influence of Beethoven is so strong that it is impossible to acquit the composer of direct plagiarism, and, speaking generally, the work is too long and too deficient in variety to be thoroughly effective, though its revival was welcome as a curiosity. In listening to Gade's Overture "In the Highlands," it is advisable to forget that it is intended as a picture of Scottish life and scenery. As a piece of abstract music, it is agreeable and even charming, but, unlike his friend Mendelssohn, the Danish composer could not merge his own individuality in the subject he sought to illustrate, and the Overture will therefore not compare with the "Hebrides," not to mention the Scotch Symphony. The most enjoyable features of the Concert were Signor Piatti's rendering of two movements of Molique's Violoncello Concerto in D, and Mr. Lloyd's magnificent singing of Lohengrin's Legend and Farewell from the third act of Wagner's opera.

If enterprise could make an undertaking successful, Mr. Henschel's Concerts ought to enjoy the best of fortune. The programme of Tuesday evening, the 24th ult., was a model in its way, but unfortunately the London public never evinces much desire to be led into new and untrodden paths. Out of five items, four were either absolutely or comparatively strange, and to musicians each one of these possessed undeniable interest. English art was represented by Dr. J. F. Bridge's Overture "Morte d'Arthur," a work composed in 1885, and first performed at Mr. Stockley's Birmingham Concerts, and later under Mr. Riseley, at Bristol. This is the first important orchestral composition of the talented organist of Westminster Abbey, and for an initial effort it must be accounted a success. We are told that each theme represents an idea taken from Tennyson's poem, but we prefer to regard the Overture as abstract music, in which sense it is an important symphonic movement, consisting of an extended introduction and a well-worked out Allegro vivace in C minor, with a particularly expressive second subject. Dr. Bridge conducted his work, which was received with enthusiasm. The next item was the first four movements (forming a complete symphony) of Mozart's delightful "Haffner" Serenade, a work most undeservedly neglected. Madame Néruda played the violin obbligato superbly, though we must take exception to the rapid pace adopted in the fourth movement. Allegro is scarcely synonymous with prestissimo. Beethoven's aria to words from Goethe's "Claudine von Villa Bella," sung by Mr. Henschel, is one of those pieces recently published in the supplemental volume of his complete works. It is a lively buffo piece, not unlike Rocco's song in "Fidelio"; but its value, except as a curiosity, is not great. Yet another feature of interest was Bizet's Suite "Roma," first performed in London seven years ago, highly praised at the time, and since utterly neglected. Though not of uniform merit, the final (Carnival) movement being on a lower level than the other three, the Suite is on the whole a very attractive and original example of French art, and it will be strange indeed if it is permitted to rest in obscurity for another seven years.

MONDAY AND SATURDAY POPULAR CONCERTS.

CONSIDERABLE spirit has marked the direction of these Concerts since Christmas, and Mr. Chappell has secured some very large audiences. The entertainments were resumed on Saturday afternoon, the 7th ult., when the programme commenced with Schubert's Quartet in A minor, generally known as the "Hungarian." In this lovely work Madame Néruda is heard to the greatest advantage as a leader, and the performance on this occasion was as nearly perfect as anything of its kind could well be. Mr. Hallé was the pianist, and he gave, by desire, Beethoven's so-called Sonata Pastorale. Except that his tempo in the first movement was rather slower than usual, his performance left nothing to desire as an example of purely classical pianoforte playing. The same composer's Trio in D (Op. 70, No. 1) concluded the Concert. Mr. Thorndike was a fairly acceptable substitute for Mr. Santley as the vocalist.

The dense fog which prevailed on the following Monday did not deter a considerable number of amateurs from attending St. James's Hall, the principal attraction being the first appearance this season of Miss Fanny Davies, fresh from her successes in Germany. So many young pianists deteriorate after a season or two, that it is pleasant to be able to state that no such falling off is discoverable in Miss Fanny Davies's powers. On the contrary, her rendering of Mendelssohn's familiar Prelude and Fugue in E minor (Op. 35, No. 1) was noteworthy for breadth, brilliancy of execution, and warm feeling. The audience tried their utmost to obtain an encore, but the young artist was firm in declining the honour. She also took part with Signor Piatti in Schumann's charming little Märchenbilder (Op. 113) for piano and violoncello, and in Mendelssohn's favourite Quartet in B minor (Op. 3, No. 3). Beethoven's Quartet in D (Op. 18, No. 3) commenced the Concert, and Mr. Thorndike was again the vocalist.

The Concert of Saturday, the 14th, was exceptionally attractive to all classes of music lovers. Beethoven's Septet was in the programme for the first time this season, and it is scarcely necessary to observe that no work, save, perhaps, the "Kreutzer" Sonata, possesses so great a hold on the public mind as this early effort of the Bonn master, which he professed to despise in his riper years. But for musicians there was also a Haydn Quartet for the first time. This was the one in A (Op. 20, No. 6), the last of this set remaining to be introduced to Mr. Chappell's audiences. A noteworthy feature in the work is the prominence assigned to the first violin, particularly in the slow movement, which thus possesses the character of a song without words. The Finale shows Haydn in his character of a humorist. It is a fugue with three subjects, and is directed to be played sotto voce until the last three bars. The effect of this is remarkably odd. Disregarding the three early sets and the transcriptions of the "Seven last Words," exactly a dozen Haydn Quartets remain to be added to the repertory. Miss Fanny Davies gave a thoughtful, vigorous, and altogether satisfying performance of Beethoven's Sonata in D (Op. 10, No. 3), and Mrs. Henschel's rendering of songs by Haydn, Wagner, and Liszt was one of the most enjoyable features of the Concert.

Even more interesting was the scheme of the following Monday. Works by English composers are sparingly introduced at these Concerts, and Mr. J. A. Dykes, whose Pianoforte Trio in E minor headed the programme, must regard himself as a favoured individual. The composer is a son of the late Rev. J. B. Dykes, whose beautiful hymn tunes are sung throughout the length and breadth of the land. Mr. Dykes, jun., has studied at the Frankfort Conservatorium, where he had for teachers the late Herr Raff, Herr Schulz Bernhard, and Madame Schumann. No young student could desire greater advantages, and we may add that Mr. Dykes was fortunate in having such executants as Miss Fanny Davies, Madame Néruda, and Signor Piatti for the introduction of his Trio to the public. With regard to the work, it is written in the modern German style, with much elaboration of the subject-matter and no little complexity of detail. The first and third movements are made rather than inspired music, but, on the other hand, there is so much freshness and piquancy in the Scherzo that we may fairly indulge in sanguine expectations regarding Mr. Dykes's future. The Trio was received in a highly flattering manner, the composer being called to the platform and loudly applauded. Schubert's Octet, divided into two parts, and a song by Miss Bertha Moore, completed the programme.

The Concert of Saturday, the 21st, needs only brief record. The concerted works were Beethoven's Quintet in

C (Op. 29), always a great favourite, and Chopin's Trio in G minor (Op. 8). Madame Néruda played Handel's Violin Sonata in D, and Mdle. Janotha gave five numbers of Schumann's Kreisleriana. The Polish pianist was in her quietest mood, and if her reading lacked distinctiveness, it was, at any rate, simple and unaffected. Mr. Santley introduced a pleasing air, "Il pensier sta negli oggetti," from Haydn's "Orfeo ed Euridice."

There is equally little to say concerning the Concert of Monday, the 23rd, which is the last we can notice this month. Haydn's Quartet in A (Op. 20, No. 6) was repeated, and the only other concerted work was Mozart's beautiful Trio in E (No. 6). Mdle. Janotha displayed fine powers of execution in Schumann's Novelette in F, Mendelssohn's Lied, No. 29 (not the Gondolier quoted in the programme), and Chopin's Scherzo in B minor; and Madame Néruda gave a splendid rendering of Vitali's Chaconne in G minor, for violin. Miss Carlotta Elliot was the vocalist, and she may be commended for her un-hackneyed selection, comprising an air, "Ch' io mai vi possa," by Handel, and Lieder by Eckert and Fischhof.

ROYAL ACADEMY OF MUSIC.

THE Morning Post of the 22nd ult. contained the following article concerning the still vacant office of Principal of the Royal Academy of Music:—

"The members of the committee of the Royal Academy of Music are probably moved by good and sufficient reasons for their action in allowing the first month of the new year to advance without exhibiting any sign of activity in the direction expected of them by the public. It was reported and understood that the provisional triumvirate direction, created immediately after the death of the late principal, Sir George Macfarren, was to exist until the end of the then current year to allow time for a good selection of his successor. Nothing appears to have been done in the way of electing the principal, or of officially contradicting the rumours made outside concerning the matter. If there is no indication of activity, speculation will be indulged in by the public concerning a public institution. The members of the committee have a perfect right to be deliberate in their choice, for the appointment is one which will considerably influence the future character of the Academy. The professors and teachers at present connected with it are eminent enough within its walls, but there are few of the younger men among them who are known beyond those boundaries. The names of several men of note have been mentioned as possible candidates, perhaps without their sanction, if not without their knowledge. Those who have been formerly associated with the Academy as pupils will doubtless have preference among the nominated. A large amount of sentiment surrounds the candidature of Mr. Walter Macfarren, the brother of the late principal. He has been associated with the Academy for a long period of years, and is fully acquainted with its plan of working as already laid down. The business to be done would seem to require a man whose years are less numerous and whose activity would increase his authority. On these grounds the name of Mr. Joseph Barnby has been brought forward. He, however, holds a position at Eton College, whose pecuniary emoluments are far in excess of what could possibly be obtained from the post of principal of the Royal Academy. It is scarcely reasonable to expect that he would, for all the memories of his former connection with, and his present position in, the Academy, make so sweeping a sacrifice as he would have to do. He is well known as a conductor and as a choir trainer; his other qualifications would possibly develop. The name of Alexander Campbell Mackenzie has also been mentioned as a possible candidate. If the Academy desires to honour itself in its own eyes, and in those of the world at large, there should be no hesitation in offering him the post, for a better selection it would be difficult to make. Dr. Mackenzie is an old student of the Academy—he was, in fact, King's Scholar, the highest distinction a student could obtain—and having passed through the classes in certain foreign conservatoires he knows the duties of a pupil. As one of the leading teachers in Edinburgh for a period of fifteen years he gained great experience as a teacher. As well by his personal character, his singular honesty of purpose, and his wide-minded sympathies he is morally as well as artistically qualified. He is a linguist, knowing French, German, and Italian, and he also, possessing a great continental reputation, would sustain the prestige of the institution. While knowing the works of the best modern composers, he is also deeply read in and intimately acquainted with the works of the old classic writers. His own compositions are known throughout the world. He is, therefore, without doubt, distinctly the best man for the appointment, that is to say, if it is desired to offer it to one who has earned a name both within and without the walls of the Academy."

M. DE PACHMANN'S RECITAL.

PIANISTS of distinction are not so numerous that the temporary retirement of M. de Pachmann from the concert platform could be regarded with complete indifference. He was decidedly missed, and his re-appearance at St. James's Hall, on Monday, the 16th ult., was therefore welcome in like measure. It is to the Russian artist that we owe a revival of the true method of dealing with Chopin's most poetical creations. A double portion of the Polish musician's spirit seems to have descended upon him, and a conspicuous proof of this was afforded on the above occasion. Among the items in the Recital programme was the Concert Allegro in A (Op. 46). This is one of Chopin's least esteemed compositions; it is rarely heard in public, and is generally pronounced dry and uninspired. It is therefore not too much to say that M. de Pachmann's performance came as a species of revelation to those who heard it. That which before seemed obscure became lucid and full of meaning; thematic passages which to the eye and ear appeared overloaded with masses of ornamental figures and bravura work were brought into prominence and were found to possess life and beauty. The true artist is a creator as well as an executant, and by this performance M. de Pachmann afforded a salient instance of the fact. On the whole, his playing on this occasion was distinguished by greater breadth of style than heretofore. Among the best features of his programme were Bach's great Fugue in A minor and Beethoven's Sonata in F (Op. 54). The last-named somewhat enigmatical work is not often heard in public, and probably to many of those present it came in the light of a novelty.

M. PRADEAU'S SCHUMANN RECITALS.

It is only within the last few years that the pianoforte works of Schumann have become really popular in this country. Their strange originality of form and their excessive difficulty caused them to be regarded for a long time with distrust, and only a few of the smaller pieces, such as the Novelletten or the Phantasiestücke were heard from time to time. Now all is changed; the Carnaval, the Etudes Symphoniques, the Faschingsschwank, and the Kreisleriana have become as familiar as household words, and there is no longer any danger of the foremost of the romantic composers of modern Germany being underestimated. The announcement of a series of Schumann Recitals, on Tuesday afternoons, at the Princes' Hall, was therefore likely to prove attractive to a large circle of amateurs, though the name of the executant might carry no weight in itself. M. Gustave Pradeau is, we believe, a foreign musician, who has resided among us for some time, doing useful work in an unostentatious way, and it would have been better for his reputation had he not elected to stand in the fierce light that beats upon the Concert platform. We shall not join those who have seized the occasion to indulge in cheap ridicule, more or less questionable in respect of taste, but it behoves us to express an opinion that M. Pradeau should have more carefully estimated his executive powers before he ventured to measure himself with the leading pianists of the day. The task he set himself was manifestly beyond his physical means, and his attempts to grapple with such formidable works as the Sonata in F sharp minor (Op. 11) and the Fantasia in C (Op. 17), at the first Recital, on the 17th ult., were calculated to make the judicious grieve.

MUSICAL ASSOCIATION.

At the meeting on the 2nd ult. Mr. T. L. Southgate read a paper on "The Physiology of Pianoforte Playing, with a practical application of a new Theory," being a communication from Mr. W. Macdonald Smith, of Oporto, a gentleman who had elaborately investigated the physiological side of pianoforte playing, had classified the particular muscles engaged in the operation, and had invented for their development and control certain small pieces of mechanism. Mr. Southgate defended the use of a rational mechanical aid in educating the hand of the pianist, arguing that the time thus saved might be more profitably employed in studying the intellectual side of music. After describing the hand with its various muscles, and explaining the process by which they were put in motion, he dwelt upon the difficulties which confronted the player in bringing the muscles under control. Mr. Macdonald Smith's theory is defined in the following formula—"The systematic reiterated performance of each separate elementary movement requisite in pianoforte playing, with a rapidity greater than can ever be required, in their combination, tends not only to develop and bring the various muscles under more perfect control, but to supply the pianist with a reserve of greater power than he will ever be called upon to put forth."

Mr. Southgate exhibited and showed in action the machines which Mr. Smith had invented. The first apparatus is termed the wrist strengthener. The hand is required to grasp a roll, the wrist resting on a fixed block, this roll has to be moved rapidly up and down. If the work is done with sufficient force and rapidity it causes a wheel to revolve and raises a small weight. Number two is the whistle bâton. This resembles a conductor's stick, but its top consists of a hollow cylinder in which works a little piston. The student, grasping the stick firmly, beats 4-4 time in the ordinary manner. If this is done with sufficient strength and rapidity the piston is driven violently up to the top of the cylinder and causes a whistle to sound. Number three is a box from which projects a key of the usual type. If depressed with sufficient rapidity or lifted quickly enough a bell is sounded. Number four is designated the scissors extender. This is a brass pillar supporting at the top a bell; on a projecting arm is pivoted an arrangement resembling a pair of scissors and consisting of two slender bent wires having grooves at the bottom in which to insert the tips of two fingers. If the fingers are suddenly parted with sufficient force it causes a small ball to fly up and strike the bell. All these exercises can be regulated in difficulty as desired by the student, and it was stated that as little as ten minutes a day practice with them would be of more use than hours of dreary scale and five-finger work. The instruments are practically simple and can be made very cheaply. Two other exercises not requiring mechanical aid were also described, one for turning the thumb under and the other for practice of the tremolo. Mr. Smith puts the question of muscle training and exercise in a new light; he seems to deal with the condition of the hand and the fitting it for the work it has to do in a distinctly novel manner. In concluding his paper, Mr. Southgate spoke of the modern danger of over-estimating the value of technique, and uttered a protest against the worship at the present day of execution and force, which seems to dazzle some people. The general tone of the discussion which followed was favourable to Mr. Smith's apparatuses.

CONFERENCE OF THE NATIONAL SOCIETY OF PROFESSIONAL MUSICIANS.

A LARGE gathering of the members of this Society, the third annual conference, was held in London in the first week of the year. On Wednesday, the 4th ult., the Lord Mayor received the Society in the fine hall belonging to the Drapers' Company, and warmly welcomed the attempt to establish a common meeting ground for musicians of all schools, and to place the teaching of the art on a level with that of all surrounding branches of education. At the close of the conference, on the Friday afternoon, his Lordship and the Lady Mayoress entertained the members at the Mansion House, congratulated them upon the earnest and business-like manner in which their discussions had been conducted, and pledged the Corporation of London to afford them all assistance and honour whenever again they may hold their conference in the Metropolis. Two meetings were held in the Drapers' Hall and four in the picturesque old room of the Painters' Company; Mr. Cummings, Dr. Heap (Birmingham), and Dr. Hunt (Birkenhead) in turn presiding. The subjects considered on the Wednesday and Thursday were well chosen. Perhaps the programme for the Friday morning was less interesting and important.

On the Wednesday and Thursday evenings the members and their friends assembled at the Princes' Hall, Piccadilly, to listen to Chamber Music by members of the Association, and we may especially compliment Mr. Cowen upon his Pianoforte Trio, very brilliantly played; Dr. Heap upon his Clarinet and Piano Duet; Dr. Creser upon his String Quartet; Mr. C. E. Stephens for his Piano Duet, in which Miss Smyth most ably assisted the author; and Mr. J. F. Barnett upon his Trio in C minor—a very effective composition. The early part of the Friday afternoon was devoted to the enjoyment of a dissertation by Mr. Hipkins, F.S.A., upon the old music written for the clavichord, spinet, and harpsichord, illustrated by performance upon the instruments, now so rare, for which the music was written.

An additional charm was given to this year's conference by the attendance of a representative, and former President of the National Music Teachers' Association of America—Mr. Calixa Lavallée, of Boston—who came to England to assure the members of the interest with which their movement was regarded in the United States. In seconding a vote of thanks to Mr. Lavallée (at the request of the Chairman, Mr. Cummings), and again in proposing his health on the Thursday evening, Dr. Hiles alluded to the great work now undertaken by the American Association, and the effect it must have upon the development of a National School of Music, the outcome of the enthusiasm, freedom, and perseverance of the English-speaking people of the Western world.

The report of the condition of the Society, read by Mr. E. Chadfield, of Derby, the general secretary, stated that since the previous visit of the Association to London, two years ago, the number of members had been doubled; and that the examinations held under the auspices of the General Council have been welcomed throughout the country.

Next year's Conference will be held in Cambridge.

MR. DANNREUTHER'S MUSICAL EVENINGS.

ALTHOUGH these performances only appeal to a limited clientèle, they are always of sufficient interest to claim some notice in these columns, Mr. Dannreuther making it a point in every series to bring forward some of the best available novelties from native as well as foreign sources. If he is unable to present new works of the first calibre the fault does not rest with him. We fancy Mr. Charles Hallé was the first to introduce the name of Karl Nawratil into London Concert programmes, but the composer is as yet but little known, and we fear a Pianoforte Quintet in C minor (Op. 17), which was played at Mr. Dannreuther's first Concert this season, on the 5th ult., will not increase the feeling of curiosity concerning him. It is a dry and tedious work, the first movement, with its endless repetitions of one figure, being especially tiresome, though in the slow movement there is some approach to genuine expression. Far superior, however, is a new Sonata in C minor, for piano and violin, by Grieg (Op. 45), performed on the 19th ult. Here we have music full of character and energy, a little vague perhaps in matters of detail, but never dull. The last movement is in the Scandinavian composer's best manner, and the whole Sonata should be brought forward at some of our leading Concerts. Of the rest of Mr. Dannreuther's novelties we must speak in our next issue.

THE PEOPLE'S PALACE.

ON Saturday evening, the 21st ult., the majestic strains of Handel's "Messiah" were heartily enjoyed by 4,000 of the people assembled in the Palace erected and set apart solely for their use and entertainment. However accustomed to vast audiences, one could not look upon the scene without experiencing a thrill of pleasure. The central hall itself is eminently beautiful, and happily its beauty is not of a sombre kind, but of a character so bright and cheerful as to raise the spirits of a visitor escaping from dull habitations and dreary thoroughfares. Those present on this occasion were unmistakably of a class by no means wanting in self-respect. This, by the way, will not cause the least surprise to those familiar with our industrial districts. Moreover, they evinced not only respect, but also enthusiastic admiration for the Oratorio undergoing representation. Each important number was received with favour, while the applause at the termination of the chorus "For unto us" was so prolonged as to make a repetition inevitable. More imposing than this demonstration was the rising of the people from their seats at the starting of the "Hallelujah" Chorus. This spontaneous movement of the multitude was looked upon as a tribute paid to art, as well as an act of homage offered to Him whose praises were being celebrated. Perhaps the friendly attitude of the audience towards the orchestra was in some measure owing to the fact that the executants were regarded as neighbours, the performers being members of the Popular Musical Union. Formed some few years ago for the musical training and recreation of the industrial classes, this Society has already done excellent service, and gives promise of working incalculable good in the East End of London. Its present efficiency was shown in the rendering of Handel's Oratorio; especially was it evident in the choral sections of the work. With a thoroughly satisfying body of tone, the choir sang the choruses with a certainty of attack deserving of the applause so freely accorded. To name one instance, the fugue number "He trusted in God" was sustained in a manner that revealed each detail, so that the listener was enabled to follow the progress of the subjects as they were carried on by the several parts. So excellent was the chorus-singing, that it might compare not unfavourably with the best efforts of some of the famous West End choral bodies. Careful practice alone could bring about such a result. With the exception of five professional players, the entire orchestra, choral and instrumental, was composed of members of the several classes instituted for the practice of the art by the Popular Musical Union. The principal teacher of these classes is the well-known professor, Mr. W. Henry Thomas, the Conductor also of the Concert, who, before collecting his forces together, drills them in detachments. This arrangement accounts for the complete understanding existing between the performers and their Conductor, whose firm beat and clear directions were at all times followed with earnestness and zeal. The executants seemed conscious that they were entrusted with the important task of entertaining neighbours and fellow-workers. It is not too much to say that they realised in this way the intentions of the founders and committee of the Union, whose self-imposed mission is not so much to supply the district with concerts as to qualify the people themselves to take part in musical performances. The principal singers rendered the solos in a very satisfactory manner. Concerning the ability of Mr. William Nicholl (tenor) and of Miss Mary Willis (contralto) only a passing reference is needed, as their talents are generally acknowledged, but the other soloists made on this occasion their first appearance in public. The soprano recitatives and airs were sung by Mrs. Arthur James (daughter of Mr. Cavendish Bentinck), who may be cordially commended for the kindness of thought and for her interest in the scheme as to give her valuable services in so good a cause as that for which the performance was undertaken. Her brilliant and powerful soprano voice, with its sweetness of quality, and clear enunciation, won the admiration of the audience. In the bass solos Mr. Plunkett Greene achieved a decided success. Possessing a voice not only full and sonorous, but so flexible as to enable him to sing the divisions in "Why do the nations" with unwonted facility, this young artist gave promise throughout the evening of becoming eventually one of our most prominent vocalists.

OBITUARY.

STEPHEN HELLER.—On the 14th ult. this well-known and popular composer for the pianoforte—upon which instrument he was no mean executant—passed away in Paris, where he had resided many years, for some time in retirement and affliction. Heller was born on May 15, 1814, at Pesth, and destined for the bar by his father, who, however, prudently abandoned the idea on discovering that the spirit of music dwelt in his son and claimed him for its own. Stephen was a "prodigy." At nine years of age he played, with his master, Dussek's Concerto for two pianos, the scene being the theatre of his native town. This achievement induced his parents to send the child to Vienna, and place him under the care of Carl Czerny, who gave him a few lessons only. From Czerny, young Heller was transferred to a teacher named Halm, of whom nothing else seems to be known. In 1827-8 we find Heller giving concerts in Vienna, preparatory to setting out on an extended tour, which embraced the principal cities of Austria, Hungary, and Germany. Weak in health, melancholy of disposition, and conscious that his equipment as a musician began and ended with ability to use his fingers on the keyboard, Heller was beginning to despair, when he interested in his favour a lady amateur of Augsburg, whose children required a teacher. The lad—he was only sixteen—accepted the post, and settled down in the old city under the motherly wing of his patroness. The happiest results followed. Instead of flitting from city to city, constantly playing, and learning nothing, Heller had leisure to study the works of the great masters, to hear them performed, and benefit by the advice of the older musicians around. At once he blossomed into an artist of high aims and conscious power, but felt in no hurry to display himself before the world. In 1833, being then nineteen, he visited Pesth to see his relatives, but soon hastened back to Augsburg, whence he sent his first published works to the publishers. These brought him under the notice of Robert Schumann, who gave him a word of praise in the Neue Zeitschrift für Musik, and largely helped to make them favourably known. Heller quitted his beloved Augsburg in 1838, and went to Paris, then the headquarters of art. There he settled down for the rest of his life, and gave himself to the work of composition. He appeared very little in public. Melancholy by nature, he shunned all society but that of a few intimates, and, as he took no pains to become popular, his advance was very slow. His biographer, Mr. Barbedette, says that, with his attractive qualities, "he was certain, had he followed the example of others, to arrive at speedy distinction. But Heller was not made of such stuff. He preferred to plough his own furrow unaided. And he did so, but slowly indeed, and at the cost of many disappointments." At first Heller's pieces did not suit a public taste formed on more flimsy and less poetical effusions. Only Charles Hallé, who was then in Paris, dared publicly to play them, but as taste improved, they came more and more into vogue, till they spread over the world and made the composer's name familiar in every household. Mr. Barbedette says that "Heller's works are at least as important as those of Chopin." We cannot go so far as that, for we see in Chopin the expression of a more positive and nobler genius. But Heller was, so to speak, the Chopin of middle-class amateurs, who have a difficulty in comprehending the high-flown romanticism and the altogether strange nature of the greater man. Heller, nevertheless, did a great work. He assisted largely in the reform of household music, and helped in no mean degree to form a taste for higher things than his own. For this alone he deserves a grateful remembrance.

HENRI HERZ.—This once famous pianist died in Paris, on the 6th ult., at the good old age of four-score years and two to a day, having been born in Vienna on January 6, 1806. He first studied music under his father, at Coblenz, and made such rapid progress that he performed Hummel's Variations (Op. 8) in public when only eight years old. Six months later he composed a sonatina for the piano. In 1816, being then the age of Joseph Hofmann now, Herz was taken to Paris and entered at the Conservatoire, as a member of Pradher's class for the piano. There he won the first prize for his instrument after four days' preparation, undertaken on rising from a bed of sickness; the works performed being a study by Clementi and Dussek's twelfth Concerto. In 1818 appeared the first results of his studies in composition, and thenceforward his name rapidly became known; Herz at once found a model when Moscheles visited Paris, and copied it with such success that his brilliant career may be said to date from the period in question. In great favour as a performer, Herz was even more fashionable as a composer of light, showy pieces, now, happily, out of date. Two hundred of these and other works were in print as far back as 1861, and it is said that publishers were willing to pay Herz four or five times as much as they gave to any other composer. Herz visited England in 1833, and was received with enthusiasm. Later on he associated himself with a company of pianoforte manufacturers, and subsequently started a business of his own which became, and still is, famous. Herz travelled much on artistic tours, especially in North and South America, but on his return to Paris in 1851 he began to lose interest in the practice of his art and gradually relinquished it all together, though his chair at the Conservatoire was not abandoned till 1874. Herz can hardly be said to have had any claim to consideration as an artist pur sang. He was a masterful composer and performer of flashy pieces, and took care, in the true spirit of a tradesman, to provide the public with what they liked, regardless of any higher consideration.

CARL STEPAN, the once famous singer, died on December 30 from blood-poisoning, following an amputation of the leg. He was the father of the clever artist who still sings in the Carl Rosa Opera Company under the stage name of Mr. Max Eugène. Carl Stepan was born at Strakonitz, Bohemia, in December, 1822. He resigned the post of "Court singer" at Mannheim in 1870, and came to England, where he sang Don Giovanni, Valentine in "Faust," and other parts, under Mr. Mapleson. He also sang successfully at many Concerts, including the original series of Oratorio Concerts then being carried on by Messrs. Novello and Co. at St. James's Hall. He was principal baritone at the Pro-Cathedral, Kensington, until about three years ago, when ill-health interfered with the performance of his public duties.

THE name of CHAPLIN HENRY (HENRY CHARLES STROUD) must also be added to the list of those recently deceased. He died on the 12th ult., in his sixty-second year. He was originally a bookseller, but having a fine bass voice he relinquished that business for the profession of music. He was at first attached to the choir of Surrey Chapel, in the Blackfriars Road, and when Mr. Henry Leslie's Choir was started he was one of the earliest members. He was principal bass at the Foundling Chapel for many years. His daughter, Elizabeth (Bessie Stroud), was married to Mr. Montem Smith of Westminster Abbey.

THE death is announced of Signor GIUSEPPE FANCELLI, at the age of fifty-three. He was originally a labourer, but possessed a tenor voice of rare quality and power. Signor Fancelli sang at the Italian Opera in Paris, and thence came to London, appearing at the Royal Italian Opera, under the late Mr. F. Gye, in April, 1866, in "La Traviata," and afterwards, and for several seasons, singing under the management of Mr. J. H. Mapleson, at Drury Lane and Her Majesty's. Signor Fancelli was absolutely ignorant of the art of music and learnt his parts by ear; he never sang out of tune. Although a very poor actor, the beauty of his voice carried all before it, and few tenors of his day were more popular in his native land. He had saved up sufficient money to render further work needless, and accordingly retired into private life at a farm he had purchased in the neighbourhood of Florence, where he died of meningitis, on the 22nd ult.

PROSPECTUS.

THIS company has been formed for the purpose of erecting a Concert Hall to seat about 4,000 persons, with orchestral accommodation for 700 performers; also a Minor Hall, with subsidiary suites of rooms, a spacious and handsome restaurant, smoking rooms, &c.

In addition to the main object of providing a perfect concert hall, the premises will be especially suitable for chamber concerts, banquets, large meetings, balls, &c.

The directors have been fortunate in securing a site close to Victoria Station, with three frontages. The area extends over about 20,000 superficial feet, and is for the most part freehold. The remainder is held under a licence from the Metropolitan Board of Works.

The position is unrivalled, as it is within a few yards of the Victoria Stations on the Metropolitan, District, London, Brighton and South Coast, and London, Chatham and Dover Railways, from whence it is proposed to construct a subway connecting these stations with the hall and restaurant, thus giving a direct approach under cover from any station round London on the whole system of the Underground Railways.

The Concert Hall will be built with due regard to acoustic properties, and with all the latest improvements in ventilation, electric lighting, seating, &c.

Ample means of exit will be provided, and the entire premises will be constructed of fire-proof materials. Electric light will be used throughout the buildings.

It is generally admitted that the necessity for adequate concert room accommodation in London has existed for many years. The only two buildings really available for large orchestral and choral performances are the St. James's Hall, said to seat only about 2,000 persons, and the Albert Hall, found to be impracticable on account of its great size.

The National Concert Hall meets a pressing and increasing want, and will enable the directors to provide orchestral, oratorio, and other concerts with the best artists of the day and with the greatest efficiency procurable, at prices much lower than those prevailing at present.

During last season the prices paid for best seats at the great orchestral concerts varied from 10s. 6d. to 15s., but concerts on a similar scale have been constantly given in Paris by M. Colonne and M. Lamoureux at popular prices with great success.

It is well known that the ever-increasing musical public of London will readily support concerts of the first class if the prices of admission are more reasonable.

The directors contemplate assimilating their prices to those charged on the Continent.

A large organ will be erected in the grand concert hall, and organ recitals will be given by the most popular organists of the day.

The buildings are to be commenced immediately, and it is intended that the hall shall be ready for occupation during the next autumn season.

The price to be paid for the property acquired by the vendors under some of the contracts hereafter mentioned, has been fixed by them at £60,000.

London, January 21, 1888.

It is estimated that the cost of the buildings, subway, organ, furnishing, seating, electric lighting, &c., will not exceed £85,000.

The present issue of shares is limited to 20,000, as the directors contemplate raising the balance required on mortgage, at a low rate of interest.

The directors, after careful inquiry as to the income arising from similar undertakings, are of opinion exceptional advantages are attached to this property, and that the various sources of revenue arising from concerts, letting of the halls, and the restaurant, should be sufficient to pay a minimum dividend of 8 per cent. per annum on the share capital of the company.

The directors have every confidence in recommending this enterprise as a safe and profitable investment, providing substantial security.

All preliminary expenses up to the allotment of shares (excepting brokerage) will be borne by the vendors, who are the promoters.

The following contracts have been entered into:—

Agreement dated 28th December, 1885, between the Westminster Improvement Commissioners on the one part, and Richard Barker of the other part.

Supplemental agreement dated 28th December, 1885, between the Westminster Improvement Commissioners of the one part, and Richard Barker of the other part.

Agreement dated 28th April, 1886, between Richard Barker of the one part, and James Wilkie Adamson and Thomas Stirling Begbie of the other part.

Agreement dated 28th April, 1886, between Herbert Taylor of the first part, and the Westminster Improvement Commissioners of the second part, and Thomas Stirling Begbie of the third part.

Agreement dated 28th April, 1886, between James Wilkie Adamson and Thomas Stirling Begbie.

Agreement dated 31st December, 1885, from the Metropolitan Board of Works to the Westminster Improvement Commissioners.

Agreement dated 21st December, 1887, between Joseph William Hiscock and Robert Taunton Raikes of the one part, and James Wilkie Adamson and Thomas Stirling Begbie of the other part.

Agreement dated 21st January, 1888, between James Wilkie Adamson and Thomas Stirling Begbie of the one part, and the National Concert Hall (Limited) of the other part.

The proposed plans of the building, together with the plan of the ground to be purchased, may be seen at the offices of the Company.

The memorandum and articles of association and copies of the above contracts may be inspected at the offices of the company's solicitors.

It is intended to apply for a quotation on the London Stock Exchange. Prospectuses and forms of application may be obtained from the bankers and broker and at the offices of the company.

Application for shares should be made on the form accompanying the prospectus, and lodged with the bankers, Lloyds, Barnetts and Bosanquets Bank (Limited), 72, Lombard Street, accompanied by a deposit of 10s. per share.

If no allotment be made, the deposit will be returned in full.

crowded to its fullest extent. Among the artists specially engaged were Mr. H. C. Tonking, Mr. B. M. Carrodus (violinist), and Mr. Maldwyn Humphreys (tenor). Mr. Tonking played several organ solos, including Best's Fantasia on Old English Carols, which was loudly applauded. Mr. Humphreys sang several songs successfully, but Mr. Hele, the Conductor, taking into consideration the length of the programme, wisely decided not to allow encores, though exception was made after Sullivan's "Once again." Mr. Carrodus had a good reception on his appearing to play the Andante and Finale in a Violin Concerto by Mendelssohn, and at the conclusion was heartily applauded. Mr. Carrodus also gave Berthold Tours's "Mélodie Religieuse" and a Mazurka by Wieniawski most successfully.

A short time since the Manchester Sunday School Union offered three prizes for the best setting of Whitsuntide hymns. The competition has been decided, and the winner of the first prize is Mr. W. Hannaford, Mus. Bac., Cantab., of Devonport.

The Redruth Philharmonic Society gave a Concert at Pencoy on Thursday, the 19th ult. The selections performed by the band were—"Tancredi" Overture; "Myosotis," "Ruddigore," and "Orange Blossom" Valses; "Carmen" and "British Volunteer" Marches, and "The Dance at the Forge" Fantasia. The vocalists were Miss Annie Hooper, Miss Clara Lemin, Mr. W. Juleff, and Mr. J. Lannin. Mr. H. T. Moore and Mr. J. Lemin were the accompanists, and Mr. J. Martin the Conductor.

A grand Chamber Concert was given at Druids' Hall, Redruth, on Monday, the 23rd ult. The performers were Mr. H. C. Tonking, Mr. B. M. Carrodus (violin), Mr. M. Humphreys (vocalist), and Master Harold Tonking (violin-cello). The instrumental and vocal solos, &c., were rendered in a masterly manner, and were frequently applauded.

The Saltash Choral Society commenced their rehearsals on the 23rd ult. Mr. Gaul's "Joan of Arc" is the Cantata in practice, to be performed at Easter.

The members of the Redruth Choral Society have decided to perform Mendelssohn's Oratorio "Elijah" at Easter. This Society has lately been doing excellent work, and is making the best endeavour to ensure in the future the success which attended its performance of "The Messiah" and "Creation" in the past.

MUSIC IN GLASGOW AND THE WEST OF SCOTLAND.

(FROM OUR OWN CORRESPONDENT.)

CHRISTMAS was musically observed in our city in a number of the Established churches, likewise by one or two of the Dissenting congregations, in the form of Services of Praise, consisting of appropriate hymns and readings from Scripture, taking place chiefly in the evening. The occasion is dividing attention in the larger Scottish towns with New Year's Day, though not officially recognised by Presbyterians, who form so very large a proportion of our church-goers. Other musical functions that may be referred to, not sacred, which took place in the Christmas week, were a Scotch Concert by the Pollok-shields Lyrical Society, under Mr. D. McColl, which was given in the Burgh Hall, Crosshill, on December 26, the distinctive feature of which was that the choral arrangements were all the work of local musicians; a Concert by the Crosshill Association, conducted by Mr. A. Patterson, in the same place, on the 28th, which included Schumann's New Year Song; a Concert by the Pollok-shields Association, under Mr. W. T. Hoeck, also in the same place, when Barnett's "Ancient Mariner" was performed. Two Orchestral Concerts were also given by the Choral Union, Mr. Bernhard Stavenhagen appearing at that of December 27.

On New Year's Day the annual performance of Handel's "Messiah" was given by the Glasgow Choral Union, in St. Andrew's Hall, with Miss Annie Marriott, Madame Patey, Mr. H. Piercy, and Mr. Bantock Pierpoint as principals. Dr. A. L. Peace was the Organist, and Mr. Joseph Bradley the Conductor. The West of Scotland Choral Society, under Mr. Lambeth, also performed "The Messiah" in the City Hall, on New Year's Day. On the evening of the same day a Popular Orchestral Concert was given in St. Andrew's Hall, under the bâton of Mr. Manns, the selections being of a somewhat light cast.

The fifth Subscription Concert of the Choral Union took place on the 5th ult., the E flat Symphony of Mozart being the most important number in the programme. Mr. E. Gillet played the principal part in a Concerto for violoncello and orchestra by D. Popper. This Concert was succeeded by the Popular Concert of the 7th ult., in every way as classical as that of the Subscription Series. The Saturday audiences are, it may be noted, becoming almost the mainstay of the scheme. The programmes of the Subscription Concerts of the 10th and 17th ult. contained nothing very striking, the selections, generally, being rather from among familiar compositions than from new music. Madame Belle Cole sang on the last-named occasion. Mr. Franz Rummel, pianist, also appeared at that Concert. At the Popular Concert of the 14th ult. Schumann's No. 4 Symphony in D minor and A. C. Mackenzie's ballade for orchestra, "La Belle Dame sans Merci," were given; the first was listened to with careful attention and evident appreciation, and the latter, a most expressive composition, was enthusiastically received. The next (Saturday) performance, on the 21st ult., included Mozart's Symphony "The Parisian," the Overture to "The Flying Dutchman," by Wagner, and selections from Mendelssohn and others. Master F. C. Barker appeared as solo harpist.

At the Subscription Concert of the 24th ult. the Symphonie Fantastique of Berlioz was the principal work performed. Mrs. Hutchinson sang several songs by Fischhof and others.

Dr. Stainer's church oratorio "The Crucifixion" was sung by the Woodside Church Choristers in Wardlaw Hill Church, Rutherglen, on the 18th ult. Mr. Graves acted as organist and choirmaster.

Macfarren's Cantata "The Lady of the Lake" was performed by the Paisley Choral Union on the 13th ult. The accompaniments were played by the Glasgow Choral Union orchestra. Mr. James Barr conducted.

MUSIC IN LIVERPOOL.

AFTER the usual three weeks' lull at Christmastide, the second half of the musical season here began on Tuesday evening, the 10th ult., when our premier society, the Philharmonic, gave its seventh Concert; the soloist was Mdle. Janotha, who has seldom been heard to better advantage here. She contributed Chopin's second Concerto in F, with the orchestra, and two soli—namely, a Novelette in F major, by Schumann, and a Valse Chromatique, by Leschetizky, with delicacy of tone and brilliancy of execution. The Symphony on this occasion—Svendsen's No. 2, in B flat—was a novelty, which proved to be thoroughly acceptable. Written in the usual four movements, Allegro, Andante sostenuto, Intermezzo, Andante, and Allegro con fuoco, the two last-named forming the Finale, and scored for full orchestra, it is replete with bright episodes and striking melodies, which rivet the listener's attention during the whole of the performance, there not being a dull moment from first to last. The orchestra, besides giving a well-nigh irreproachable rendering of this grand work, contributed in excellent style the Overtures to "Ferdinand Cortez," by Spontini, and "Zampa," by Hérold, as well as some ballet music from Gluck's "Paride ed Elena." The choristers had little or nothing to do, singing the Hunting Chorus from Schubert's "Rosamunde" and Smart's Part-song, entitled "Crocuses and Snowdrops." Miss Hope Glenn was the vocalist, and sang four songs in her best style. Mr. Hallé conducted.

The fifth of Mr. Hallé's series of eight Concerts was given in the Philharmonic Hall, on Tuesday evening, the 17th ult., the principal artists being Madame Norman-Néruda and Mdle. Trebelli. The first-named lady, whose last appearance it was here this season, took part with the orchestra in Spohr's 12th Violin Concerto in A, joined Mr. Hallé in a superb rendering of the Andante (with variations) and Finale from Beethoven's "Kreutzer" Sonata, and played a solo, "Ungarisches," by Raff, with orchestral accompaniment. Mdlle. Trebelli advanced considerably in the opinion of the audience by her artistic and finished performance of the airs allotted to her. The Symphony here again was a novelty, being Wagner in C. The Overtures to "Faniska," by Cherubini, and to "Der Vampyr," by Marschner, together with the Hungarian March from the "Faust" of Berlioz, completed the programme.

The Carl Rosa Opera Company began a seven weeks' stay on Monday, the 9th ult., and crowded houses have been the order of the day. Massé's bright and tuneful Opera "Galatea," was produced here for the first time, and must be pronounced a thorough success. The booking for this production was greater than can be remembered in the annals of local theatres, and necessitated its second performance two or three nights after. Auber's "Masaniello" has been revived here, and, judging from its reception, it will have to be repeated more than once. The other operas produced have been "Maritana," "The Bohemian Girl," "Nordisa," "Carmen," "Esmeralda," "Il Trovatore," and "Mignon." The season has so far been particularly noteworthy for the admirable mounting of the various operas at the Court Theatre, and for the unusual success of that rising young soprano, Miss Fanny Moody.

The newly-named Liverpool Choral Society will give their first Concert of the season early this month. The "Creation" is the work selected. It is confidently expected that the performance will be quite equal to their previous efforts.

The eighth Philharmonic Subscription Concert was given on Tuesday evening, the 24th ult., before a numerous audience, the soloists—Miss Lablache (vocalist) and Mr. Ondricek (violinist)—being new to Liverpool. There were two items on the programme which were performed for the first time here—namely, Mackenzie's "Water Music" from "Jason," and Dietrich's Overture entitled "The Normans," the latter music being bold and vigorous in character. The Symphony, splendidly played throughout, was Spohr's well known "Power of Sound." Mr. Ondricek, a violinist of unusual attainments, both in legitimate and "tricky" playing, delighted the audience by his manipulation of the instrument in Beethoven's lovely Concerto in D, and also in the soli (a) "Sérénade Mélancolique" by Tchaikowsky, and (b) "Rondo" by Laub, both of which were ably accompanied on the piano by Mr. Branscombe, the chorus-master and accompanist of the Society. In response to an encore, Mr. Ondricek gave "The Witches' Dance," by Paganini. Miss Lablache was fairly successful in her rendering of airs from "L'Italiana in Algeri" and "Lucrezia Borgia," and Tosti's song "Good-bye." The chorus sang "An old Romance," by Mendelssohn, and Beethoven's "Twine ye the garlands," from "The Ruins of Athens." The programme for the ninth Concert, to be given on the 7th inst., will include Lloyd's Cantata "Hero and Leander." Mrs. Hutchinson and Mr. Bantock Pierpoint are to be the vocalists, and Miss Fanny Davies the instrumentalist.

MUSIC IN MANCHESTER.

MR. HALLÉ's selection, for his chief solo performances this season, of the Beethoven Concerti in chronological sequence proves very interesting and instructive. The gradual expansion of the great master's insight into the possibilities of the orchestra, and the duty of the piano when combined with it, is shown as clearly in those works as it could be by the study of any other department of his labour. On the 19th ult. we reached the splendid E flat Concerto, which has so long served to mark an era in the development of this form of composition, and beyond which no one has yet seen his way. Doubtless much remains to be done ere we may reach the final settlement of the terms upon which the orchestra and the solo instrument may, with complete advantage, unite; but Beethoven unquestionably looked far into the distance, and made a very wide step toward the solution of this problem. Of Mr. Hallé's performance of Beethoven it is somewhat late to write. Nearly forty years ago he came among us with a reputation largely depending upon his rendering of the sonatas; and still his reading of the great classics of the pianist's library is marked by undiminished power, as well as by the old clearness and delicacy. Among the smaller pieces which he has played lately—either at his own Concerts or at the Recitals which he gives at the Concert Hall—we should welcome a little novelty; something to satisfy curiosity as to the modern tendencies of writers for the instrument, as well as, if possible, to satisfy by completeness and suitability. But so long as he regales us with the greater poems of the genius of the piano, we thankfully admit his right to select the smaller surroundings as he pleases, and as he judges most suitable to the taste and digestive faculties of the amateurs who attend his afternoon performances.

Among the larger and entirely orchestral works, we have recently had—for the fourth time—the "Episode de la vie d'un Artiste" of Berlioz, and (possibly for the last, as well as the first, time) Wagner's "Grand" Symphony. The combined labour of band, choir, and such principals as Miss Mary Davies, Messrs. Lloyd, Hilton, Santley, N. Dumville, and Barrow, in the rendering of the Cantata "The Childhood of Christ" was probably intended as a relief after the "Episode," but the versatility of the French composer was not so great as his eccentricity. The choir sang with rare vigour Mendelssohn's magnificent Psalm "When Israel out of Egypt came," a masterpiece given only for the second time, and after an interval of twenty-five years.

The undertakings of the directors of the "Gentlemen's Concerts" have, during the month since I wrote, included one orchestral performance, on December 27 (and consequently attended by an audience miserably small, even for the Concert Hall), Mr. Hallé's Recitals, and a meeting, held on the 18th ult., to consider the present unhappy condition of the institution. After a little music Sir William Houldsworth and Mr. Hallé expatiated upon the history of the Society, its important services, and the advisability of an earnest effort being made to revive it. It appears that at least 100 new subscribers must be obtained in order to justify the hopes of the promoters.

On the 7th ult. Mr. de Jong introduced here a young débutante, Miss Sarah Berry, a native of Bamford, in this county, who holds the Courtenay Scholarship in the Royal College of Music. Possessing a contralto voice of great beauty and equality of tone, Miss Berry needs only to persevere in her study to attain a very honourable position in her profession. In her first effort she showed great self-possession and readiness by calmly proceeding to the end of the recitative introducing Gluck's "Che farò," in spite of a most unfortunate contretemps arising from some imperfection in the band parts. Conductors will be glad to know of a young singer not easily thrown out of her part. Miss Sarah Berry is to re-appear on the 4th inst.

For his Concert on the 21st ult. Mr. de Jong engaged Mr. Mapleson's Opera Concert party, with which was associated the new eleven-years-of-age prodigy, Mdlle. Pauline Ellice. The interest of the long programme culminated in the piano solos—wherein the little girl showed considerable brilliancy, unclouded by that nerve excitation which comes when the artistic sensibility begins to quicken—and the flute-like height and clearness of execution of the American songstress, Mdlle. Marie Decca; who, with apparent ease, warbled Mozart's trying "Gli angui d'inferno."

MUSIC IN SOUTH WALES AND MONMOUTHSHIRE.

(FROM OUR OWN CORRESPONDENT.)

THE Opera "Blodwen" was performed at Merthyr by the local Orpheus Society, with full scenic and stage effects, on Monday, December 26, and several following nights. Mr. G. H. Rees was the organist, Mr. W. Rowlands played the harmonium accompaniments, and Miss E. Jones was pianist. The Conductor was Mr. W. H. Powell.

The eighteenth annual Eisteddfod was held at Treherbert, Rhondda, on December 26. Mr. E. H. Davies, Pentre, presided, and the musical adjudicator was Mr. R. C. Jenkins, R.A.M., Llanelly. For the best rendering of a Welsh part-song a prize of £10 was given to a Ton Ystrad party. "Thanks be to God" was the test piece for the chief choral prize of £50. Four choirs competed—viz., Rhondda Philharmonic, Rhondda United, Blaencwm United, and Libanus United. The last-named choir, led by Mr. D. Davies, was adjudicated the winner. There was a Concert in the evening.

On the same day the ninth annual Eisteddfod at Fernel-dale, Rhondda, took place. The musical adjudicator was Mr. J. John. The chief choral prize for the best rendering of "Yr Haf" was divided between the Mardy and Tre-rhondda choirs.

An Eisteddfod was also held on December 26 at Treorky. Mr. Proudman, London, adjudicated. The attendance was very large. Two choirs (Porth and Cymmer United and Treorky United) competed for a prize of £20, offered for the best rendering of "We never will bow down," which the latter won. The chief choral test piece was the same as at the neighbouring Eisteddfod at Treherbert—"Thanks be to God"—and the prize similar in amount. Libanus, Porth and Cymmer, Rhondda Philharmonic, Blaencwm United Society, and Rhondda United Society were the competitors. The prize was taken by Blaencwm.

On Boxing day Eisteddfodau were also held at Cardiff, at Cefn near Merthyr, at Ebbw Vale, Llangaitho, Abercarn, and other places.

The Cardiff Orchestral Society gave a Concert at the Park Hall, on the Wednesday after Christmas Day, under the conductorship of Mr. S. G. Fifoot. Vocal assistance was rendered by Madame Patey, who was most enthusiastically received and applauded, and Mr. Lucas Williams. It should also be mentioned that out of respect to the memory of the late Sir George Macfarren, the "Dead March" was played at the opening of the programme.

On the 2nd ult. a Choral Festival was held at Dowlais. Mr. Daniel Thomas presided over the morning meeting, at which a choir of 800 children sang. The adult choir of 700 sang at the afternoon and evening meetings. The Conductor in each case was Mr. Dan Davies.

An Eisteddfod will be held at Neath on Easter Monday. The chief choral prize will be £50 and a gold medal, and the test piece "Worthy is the Lamb."

A meeting convened by Mr. Rees Jones, Landore, and presided over by Dr. Parry, Swansea, was held at the Ebenezer Schoolroom, Swansea, on the 13th ult., with the object of promoting the establishment of a Welsh Musical Society. An affirmative resolution was agreed to, and another meeting on the subject is to be held on the 12th inst.

Regarding the next National Eisteddfod at Wrexham, it may be useful to mention that, according to the special conditions, names and competitions for the vocal and instrumental subjects must reach the Society on or before June 1. In the male voice competition no instrumental accompaniment will be allowed; in the other competitions it will be at the option of the competitors to have a harmonium or pianoforte accompaniment. Amateur bands only are to compete for brass band prizes, but a conductor may act for more than one band, and he may be a professional musician. No objections will be entertained unless full particulars are forwarded at least one week previous to the contest.

The North Wales Eisteddfod was held at Dolgelly on the 2nd ult., when choirs from Llangollen, Festiniog, and Aberdovey competed for a prize of £40, offered for the best rendering of "Lift up your heads" ("Messiah"). Mr. Joseph Bennett, the adjudicator, awarded the prize to the Tanyrisian Choral Society, Festiniog.

MUSIC IN THE WEST.

Two ballad Concerts were given on December 26 by Mr. J. F. Nash, of Bristol Cathedral, in the Victoria Rooms, Clifton, before very fairly numerous audiences, attracted chiefly by the announcement of Mdle. Marie de Lido and Mr. Iver McKay as vocalists. The Bristol Cathedral Quartet also rendered good service, giving some glees and part-songs with effect. Two of the members of the quartet, Mr. Morgan and Mr. Thomas, also contributed several solos, and Mrs. Viner Pomeroy (in place of Miss Bennett) gave four pianoforte solos with her usual brilliancy of execution. Mr. McKay's fine singing evoked hearty approval and was deservedly encored.

The chief event of last month was the annual "Ladies' Night" given by the Bristol Madrigal Society, in the Victoria Rooms, Clifton, the large room being, as usual, taxed to its utmost to accommodate the numbers assembled there. We append the programme—"God save the Queen," Horsley; "Let us all go Maying," Pearsall; "Fair Oriana," Hilton; "Matona, lovely maiden," Lassus; "I follow, lo, the footing," Morley; "A song for the season," H. Smart; "Let me carelessly," Linley; "O hills, O vales of pleasure," Mendelssohn; "Dainty white pearl," Bicci; "All ye that love fair freedom," Pearsall; "Now is the month," Morley; "To other day as I was twining," C. Santley; "Sweet honey sucking bees," Wilbye; "Sweet flowers," T. A. Walmisley; "Thyrsis, sleeper thou," Benet; "Charm me asleep," H. Leslie; "Sir Patric Spens," Pearsall; "When Thoralis delights," Weelkes; "Home," Benedict; "The Waits," Savile. The Society fully maintained its high reputation at this, its 52nd Concert; but we should like to enter our protest against the system of granting so many encores, especially during the early part of the evening, the sad result of which practice was evident in the weariness of the voices, and the consequent falling of the pitch during the second half of the Concert, especially amongst the boys. A great deal of interest was felt in Mr. Santley's composition, which certainly received every justice at the hands of the Madrigalians. It was listened to with evident pleasure and was encored, its sprightly and dramatic character appealing to the general taste. We could willingly further discuss the performances, but must be content with a word of praise for the admirable rendering of Benedict's "Home," and in conclusion we would offer our hearty congratulations to the Conductor, Mr. D. Root-ham, on the excellent work he presented as the result of last year's rehearsals.

We have received no news from other towns for this letter. The notices of Herr Peiniger's and Mr. Pusey Keith's Violin and Pianoforte Recital, given at Clifton, on the 25th ult., is deferred till next month, as also that of the first of a series of Matinées Musicales, arranged by Mr. and Mrs. Pomeroy, given on the 28th ult., and that of Miss Farler's annual Concert, which took place on the 31st ult.

MUSIC IN YORKSHIRE.

(FROM OUR OWN CORRESPONDENT.)

At Mr. Rawlinson Ford's fifth Concert, given in the Leeds Coliseum, on the 11th ult., there was a very good attendance. The programme contained Beethoven's genial Quintet in E flat, the perfectly smooth and unruffled beauty of which was greatly enjoyed. The Quintet was led by Mr. Franz Rummel, with whom were associated Messrs. Dubrucq (oboe), C. Fawcett (clarinet), T. E. Mann (horn), and D. Lalande (bassoon). The performance was in every way worthy of the distinguished artists concerned, and produced a good effect. Hummel's Septet in D minor was of a not less taking quality, and the fine showy part for pianoforte had the advantage of a very clever and thoroughly artistic exposition, such as the piece peculiarly demands. The vivacious Finale was given with much vigour, the whole of the executants, who were, besides Mr. Rummel, Messrs. John Radcliff, Dubrucq, Mann, Eckener, Giessing, and Dearlove, playing with spirit as well as intelligence, and by their perfect unanimity, inspired by the pianist, afforded the audience a special pleasure. Mr. Rummel, as soloist, gave a brilliant reading of Chopin's Sonata in B flat minor, and in Liszt's Hungarian Rhapsodie (No. 2) he made "a palpable hit." His playing was exceedingly clever, alike in the matter of technical quality as in its vigour and delicacy. Two lighter pieces by Chopin—a Valse and a Berceuse—were given with exquisite taste. Another soloist was Mr. John Radcliff, who proved himself a capable flautist in the rendering of a Saltarelle by Demersseman. Mdle. Antoinette Trebelli was the vocalist, and sang with much acceptance the air "With verdure clad," Handel's "Sweet bird," and Gounod's Waltz from "Romeo and Juliet." Mr. Alfred Broughton officiated as accompanist.

The sixth Concert of the season was given on the 25th ult. The programme was of considerable length, and very entertaining through its variety. The vocalists were Madame Trebelli, Miss Alice Whitacre, Mr. Henry Piercy, and Mr. Barrington Foote. M. Hollman, Signor Bisaccia, and Mr. Marmaduke Barton shared in the instrumental items. At the Concert ensuing we are to have, along with Mr. Hallé's orchestra, Miss Agnes Zimmermann and Mr. Charles Chilly.

A more interesting Concert than that of the 6th ult., the fourth of the series, was never given by the Bradford Subscription Concerts Committee. Gounod's ballet music from "Polyeucte" and Smetana's "Lustspiel" Overture were performed. Of the latter it is sufficient to record a reception marked by unusual warmth and favour. Gounod's work was a scarcely less satisfying feature, and the Suite was, it need hardly be said, rendered to perfection by Mr. Hallé's band. Spontini's Overture to "La Vestale" proved a successful experiment, and the Huldigungs March was strikingly sonorous and grandiose. Mr. Hallé performed Weber's Concertstück in F, and Schumann's Novette in F and the familiar Arabesque admirably. Signorina Gambogi made a very successful first appearance in Bradford, her voice being one of great purity and capable of the highest efforts. Her selections were compositions by Piccini, Pacini, Schumann, and Scarlatti.

Herr Peiniger and Mr. Pusey-Keith gave a Violin and Pianoforte Recital at Huddersfield on the 16th ult. The programme was somewhat remarkable, including side by side with works by Beethoven, Bach, Spohr, Chopin, and Dvórák, compositions by Julius O. Grimm, Mantel, and Bohn. Grimm's Sonata in A had a very favourable hearing. The "Moonlight" Sonata was well rendered by the pianist, who plays with facility and good expression.

Mr. Edgar Haddock continues his musical evenings with success. At the Concert given on the 16th ult. Mr. Haddock was assisted by a student of the Royal College, Mr. W. W. Cook (a Yorkshireman, born at Lightcliffe near Halifax). One of the items on the programme was a Sonata in D minor by Mr. Cook, which seems to have had for model one of Grieg's compositions, and of which a highly favourable impression is recorded.

MUSIC IN AMERICA.

New York, January 11, 1888.

IN the metropolis the month's musical flood was stayed to a great extent by the holidays, which are always unprofitable to all amusement caterers except the Choral Societies that keep up the beautiful tradition of a Christmastide performance of "The Messiah." In Boston the Handel and Haydn Society is the conservator of the tradition, and two weeks ago it gave the work for the eightieth time in its history. In New York it is the Oratorio Society. Each year a depleted treasury is replenished by the ticket sales for the Christmastide Concert. The Newark Harmonic Society, which seems to be enjoying a new fund of vitality since Mr. E. M. Bowman became its Conductor, changed its policy this year with reference to Handel's Oratorio, and giving only a portion of it, filled the second part of the entertainment with Anderton's "Yuletide," the beauty and appropriateness of which were heartily appreciated by press and public.

The German Opera has been continuing its notable representations, though without such generous patronage from the public as it enjoyed last year. Undaunted by the fact that the receipts threaten to be 17,000 dollars less than last season, the directors have nevertheless determined to continue their present policy, and next fall will see inaugurated the fifth season of Grand Opera in German at the Metropolitan Opera House. Just now the company is hard at work with Wagner's "Götterdämmerung," which is the only promised novelty remaining to be given. It is expected that it will be ready by the 25th inst., when its production will be followed by two consecutive representations of the Nibelung tetralogy with "Rheingold" omitted. The last month brought two novelties into the repertory, Weber's "Euryanthe" and Spontini's "Ferdinand Cortez." Weber's beautiful opera had been heard in New York twenty-four years previously, but "Cortez" was entirely new. None of Spontini's music had been heard in this country previously except his overtures and a few detached pieces from his operas. The occasion was utilised by Director Stanton to give the public a peculiarly imposing stage spectacle, in which an effort was made to present truthful studies of the Aztec antiquities so far as architectural forms, banners, sacred symbols and the like were concerned. One writer for the press, in discoursing on the enterprising director's efforts at realism, called attention to the fact that the number of persons employed in the representation of "Cortez" was nearly as large as the veritable Mexican conqueror's army, and that only the horses were wanting. The music of the opera has been voted antiquated in spite of the critics who get their opinions from the essays of Dr. Spitta and Berlioz, and real amateurs have derived much less pleasure from it than from "Euryanthe."

Mr. Locke's National Opera Company, after many discouraging vicissitudes in the West, culminating in the secession from its ranks of Madame Fursch-Madi and Eloi Sylva, opened last Monday night in Boston, where "Nero" was given with much success. M. Sylva was persuaded to come back, in order that Rubinstein's opera and "Tannhäuser" might be given in accordance with promise. Mr. McGuckin has remained with the company from the beginning and has done much to keep the organisation intact.

The history of the Handel and Haydn Society is now being completed by John S. Dwight, and many points have been brought out in the work which hitherto have only been known to the members of the Society. It is a very interesting work for the general reader, and it will be conceded by all that the history of the Handel and Haydn Society is the history of music in New England, for up to a very recent period, say 1870, when the great Gilmore Jubilee gave an impetus to choral music, the "Handel and Haydn" was not only the pioneer, but to all intents and purposes the only exponent of this class of music in this country in any regularly constituted lasting form.

EARLY in the present month, Messrs. Novello will issue a new Pocket Edition of Mendelssohn's "St. Paul," price one shilling. The clearness and sharpness of the music, and the beauty of the type in which the words are printed, will commend the edition to those who know how to estimate the value of good typography, while the accuracy of the text will doubtless make it much sought after.

DR. A. C. MACKENZIE will return to London from Florence in time to conduct the rehearsals of "The Golden Legend," which is to be given at the next Novello Oratorio Concert, on the 22nd inst. At this Concert also an Overture by Mr. Oliver King will be performed for the first time.

THE half-yearly Higher Examinations of Trinity College, London, took place during last month, when the following gentlemen acted as examiners:—Mr. G. E. Bambridge, Mr. Henry R. Bird, Dr. Jacob Bradford, Mr. Arthur Carnall, Mus. B.; Mr. F. Corder, Mr. A. G. Drinkwater, M.A.; Professor James Higgs, Mus. B.; Dr. E. J. Hopkins, the Rev. Dr. Bonavia Hunt, Dr. W. H. Longhurst, Dr. A. H. Mann, Mr. M. Maybrick, Dr. C. W. Pearce, Mr. Ridley Prentice, Professor Gordon Saunders, Mus. D.; Dr. Armand Semple, B.A.; Professor Bradbury Turner, Mus. B.; and Mr. C. E. Willing. The following is the Pass List:—Harmony Certificate—Emily Morgan, Frimley (Surrey). Certificated Pianists—Alice Brown, Ipswich; Ethel A. Buckley, Parkstone (Dorset); Emma D. Caird, London; Florence Dodd, London; Annie Elizabeth Green, West Bromwich; Ethel Hensman, Northampton; Lilian Mary Harris, Trinity College, London; Louisa J. Hunt, Trinity College, London; Ada M. Ireland, High Barnet; James Henry Ledger, Leeds; Alice Sarah Long, Reading; Lilian G. Mackenzie, London; Emily M. Mainwaring, Lilanely; Sarah A. Partoon, Buntingford; Lizzie Richards, Birmingham; Alice E. P. Symes, Alton; Anna E. Thomas, London; Frank Timperley, Birmingham; Elizabeth Watson, Kidsgrove (Staff.); Mary R. Yates, Southport. Associate-Pianists—Alice Minnie Clowes, Needham Market; Agnes Cowley, Birmingham; Elizabeth B. Grose, Trinity College, London; Margaret I. Hulbert, London; Louisa J. Long, Reading; Florence Nightingale, Hampton-on-Thames; Edith Mary Sawyer, Trinity College, London; Eleanor M. Shuttleworth, London; Elizabeth G. Thomson, London; Catherine L. Towers, London. Certificated Vocalist—Julia A. Stanton, Uxbridge. Certificated Organists—Frederick E. Hillman, Trinity College, London; Eliza Wilson, Grantham. Organ-Associate—James Shaw Ford, Trinity College, London. Matriculation Certificated—Helen S. E. Crosby, Trinity College, London; Gertrude M. Mitchell, Manchester; Marion I. Sked, Birkenhead; Annie M. Wood, London; with Honours—Marion Hunt, Rye; Eva Mary Silver, Maidenhead. Further Arts Certificated—Ethel M. Bonavia Hunt, London; Ptolemy S. T. Pardy, Kingston-on-Thames; William Sidebotham, Cheadle Heath (Stockport). Preliminary Division (Associate in Music)—Robert E. Clark, High Barnet; George A. Swain, London; Arthur E. Winscom, London. Associates in Music—William Griffith, Junr., Northampton; Arthur K. Hawthornthwaite, Lancaster; John B. Heavysege, Radwinter; Frederic W. J. Lesser, London; Bertha McBlain, London; Edith Moore, Nottingham; John W. Oxley, Trinity College, London; Arthur W. Rogers, Ealing; Thomas Russe, Tiverton; Susannah J. Steel, Trinity College, London; Herbert Westerby, Stonehaven.

THE customary performance of the selections from Mendelssohn's "St. Paul," relating chiefly to his conversion, his ordination, and his departure for Jerusalem, took place on the 25th ult. at St. Paul's Cathedral. The choir was augmented by members of the Chapel Royal, Lincoln's Inn Chapel, Westminster Abbey, and the Sunday Evening Choir, and there was a full band, robed in surplices. The chants were sung to special Psalms, and the Service—Stainer in B flat—was accompanied by the band and organ, the pitch of the two forces not being always coincident. In the morning there was a full Communion Service, a large number of communicants presenting themselves. On this occasion the new reredos, erected from designs by Messrs. Burgess and Garner, was exposed to view. It is a very beautiful structure and covers the eastern apse. It is built of marbles, white and coloured, and it is approached by a pavement and wide steps of Parian and Brescian marbles. In the foreground is the communion table, and behind it rises to the height of some seventy feet the new marble reredos. In the basement are doors of pierced brass, over which are inscriptions, "Pasce oves meas," &c., and angels above them are supporting shields with the crossed swords and keys, the arms of St. Peter and St. Paul. Higher still are the most prominent features of the structure—that is to say, curved groups of sculpture in bold relief, representing in the centre the Crucifixion and Entombment, flanked by the Nativity and the Resurrection, the whole surmounted by an ideal figure of the Risen Saviour. The frieze bears the inscription "Sic Deus dilexit mundum," and there are besides statues of the Angel Gabriel and the Virgin, St. Peter and St. Paul, and others. The white of the Parian marble is happily relieved by the backgrounds of coloured marbles, and by the gilded bronze wreathings of foliage which, in accordance with Wren's idea, borrowed from St. Peter's at Rome, twine round the supporting pillars. The whole will shortly be enclosed with Wren's iron gates, which were removed from the entrance to the choir and laid in the crypt when the organ was removed.

THE following obtained the Diploma of Fellowship at the January Examination at the College of Organists:—Messrs. J. H. Mayer, W. C. Bayley, H. W. Bolling, F. E. Fletcher, H. A. Fricker, W. W. Harvey, A. Hey, E. F. Huntley, Mus. Bac., J. E. Jeffries, B. Nock, S. Round, T. Russe, J. E. Senior, H. J. Taylor, C. Wilkes, and A. R. Wood. The following obtained the Diploma of Associateship:—Messrs. W. Bamford, A. B. Bannister, T. H. Bennett, J. Bottomley, J. J. Bushill, H. B. Carter, C. E. Clemens, J. H. P. Dean, C. T. Dee, H. J. B. Dart, G. Farrant, A. Gurney, T. Hall, C. Hancock, F. M. Harrison, S. Hawley, J. C. Hele, W. H. Hopkinson, A. G. Iggulden, C. L. Jones, G. J. Kimmins, G. Lees, R. M. Lumb, C. C. Palmer, F. W. Parish, R. H. Peters, C. T. Reynolds, W. H. Richardson, W. Schofield, J. H. Slape, F. M. Smallwood, E. E. D. Smith, B. H. Steane, H. F. Stenson, H. A. Toase, R. H. Turner, and H. W. Wells; Misses B. Whyte, A. W. Wilson, and F. B. Wood. The Examiners were Dr. J. F. Bridge, Dr. E. J. Crow, Dr. F. E. Gladstone, Mr. J. Higgs, Mus. Bac.; Dr. C. Warwick Jordan, Dr. Haydn Keeton, Dr. G. C. Martin, Mr. W. Parratt, Mus. Bac.; Dr. C. W. Pearce (acting for Dr. Dyer), Mr. E. H. Turpin, and Mr. T. Wingham. The F.C.O. Diplomas were distributed by Sir George Grove, LL.D., Vice-President of the College, and the A.C.O. Diplomas were presented by Mr. C. E. Stephens.

A VERY attractive programme was provided at the Vestry Hall, Hampstead, on the 26th ult., by the Pitt Habitation of the Primrose League, on the occasion of the presentation of a testimonial to the Secretary, Miss Catherine Ray. An excellent quartet, consisting of Messrs. Sidney Barnby, Gawthrop, Hanson, and Miles, gave an admirable rendering of several Part-songs, being encored in Mackenzie's "Franklyn's Dogge." The same composer's new patriotic song, "The Empire Flag," sung by Mr. Gawthrop and a small chorus, was enthusiastically received. "Stars of the summer night" and "Because of thee," both by Berthold Tours, the former sung by Mr. Hanson and the latter by Mr. Gawthrop, accompanied in each instance by the composer, also met with great favour. Pianoforte and violin solos were contributed with excellent effect by Miss Bessie Waugh and Miss Clara Titterton respectively, while agreeable variety was given to the entertainment by the recitations of Mr. Charles Fry and his pupils, Mrs. W. Nash and Miss E. M. Churchill. Both of the ladies displayed marked ability and evidenced careful training, and Mr. Fry's humorous rendering of Mr. W. A. Barrett's clever parody on the "Lost Chord" was greeted with enthusiasm.

THE Concert given by Mr. Ralph Livings on the 11th ult., at St. Leonard's, was especially noteworthy. Mr. Livings was warmly applauded and recalled after his pianoforte solo, Chopin's Ballade in E flat, which he played with brilliancy. Mdle. Marie de Lido next gave a Russian national song, "Tzigane," with great charm. Miss Romola Tynte (a pupil of Mr. Hermann Vezin) among other pieces recited "A Legend of Provence," by Adelaide Procter, most effectively. Mr. Leo Stern, a pupil of Piatti, who has also studied at Leipzig, and during the last few weeks has won golden opinions in the metropolis, was the violoncellist. Herr Gompertz's rendering of Sarasate's bewitching Spanish Dance, No. 2, was most artistic and satisfactory in every way. The two last movements of Grieg's beautiful Sonata in F, substituted for the Trio by Gade, quite enchanted the audience by its wild freshness and quaint melodies. This was perfectly rendered by Herr Gompertz and Mr. Livings, and brought a splendid programme, upon which the Concert-giver may be heartily congratulated, to a brilliant conclusion.

THE Dedication Festival of St. Agnes', Kennington Park, S.E., commenced on Tuesday, the 17th ult. Smart's Service in F, with the Benedictus and Agnus Dei from Gounod's Messe Solennelle ("St. Cecilia"), was sung at the Holy Communion. On the Sunday within the Octave, the Service used was Weber in G, with orchestral accompaniment in addition to the organ. The solos were sung by Messrs. Toms, Cox, and Plant, and Miss E. Howes; and the Service concluded with Gounod's "Marche Solennelle," played as a voluntary by band and organ. The Magnificat and Nunc dimittis at Evensong were harmonised Gregorians, arranged by the Organist, Mr. W. W. Hedgcock. On Wednesday, the 25th ult. (Conversion of St. Paul), a selection from Mendelssohn's "St. Paul" was given, with Madame Worrell, Miss Ella Cleugh, Mr. Edward Dalzell, and Mr. Stanley Smith as principals. The choruses were sung by the choir of the church, and Mr. Hedgcock was at the organ. The whole festival was brought to a close on Friday, the 27th ult., by the singing of Stanford's Te Deum in B flat.

MR. W. DONE, the Organist of Worcester Cathedral and the Conductor of the Triennial Festival held in that city, celebrated his golden wedding-day on the 9th ult. He is a native of Worcester and has passed the greater part of his life there, and has been Organist of the Cathedral for a period nearly as long as the years of his marriage. He was Conductor of the Worcester Festival of 1845, when the arrangements were upon a more economical scale than now. In 1848 a departure was made, and Mdlle. Alboni, Madame Castellani, the Misses Williams, Miss Dolby, Mr. Sims Reeves, Signor Lablache, Mr. Lockett, Mr. Robinson, and Mr. Machin were engaged as principal vocalists. Mdlle. Jenny Lind had promised to take part, but Mr. Lumley compelled her to break her engagement. Of this goodly list, only one name is associated with the music of to-day, Mr. Sims Reeves. Mr. Done has held the Conductor's bâton at fifteen Triennial Meetings of the Three Choirs.

ST. PAUL'S Day was, in accordance with a recognised custom, marked at St. Paul's Church, Paddington, by the performance, at the evening service, of a selection from Mendelssohn's "St. Paul," sung by an augmented choir. The service consisted of choral Evensong, and the Hymns "Angel voices ever singing" (Processional), "We sing the glorious conquest," and "O Lord of heaven and earth and sea." The special Psalm (132nd) was sung to Gilbert in G, and the Canticles to Berthold Tours in F. The selections from Mendelssohn's great work were chosen with judgment. The soloists were Messrs. T. Noble, T. H. Pearson, A. Smith, and Henry Pope, there was a chorus of sixty voices, and the Conductor was Mr. T. C. Warren. The accompaniments throughout were played by Mr. H. W. Richards, F.C.O., Organist of Christchurch, Lancaster Gate.

At the Intermediate Examination in Music of the University of London (Mr. R. T. Glazebrook, M.A., F.R.S., Dr. Pole, F.R.S., Professor Reinold, M.A., F.R.S., and Dr. Stainer, M.A., Examiners) the following names were placed upon the Pass List:—First Division: Henry Vipond Bate, private study; Ada Louise Cunningham, private tuition; Thomas Henry Davis, private tuition; John Williams Eckersall, private study. Second Division: Peter James Colson, private study; Thomas Smith, private tuition and study; Edwin Thatcher, private study. B.Mus. Examination. First Division: Thomas Handel Bertenshaw, B.A., private study. Second Division: James Jeremiah Beuzemaker, B.A., private study; Samuel Alexander Herzberg, private tuition; Harry Colin Miller, private study. D.Mus. Examination.—First Division: John Williamson Reynolds, private study.

ON Monday, the 9th ult., a new Oratorio, by Mr. George Shinn, Mus. Bac., Cantab., entitled "The Captives of Babylon," was performed for the first time at Christ Church, Westminster Bridge Road, in the presence of a large audience, by whom it was most favourably received. The soloists were Madame Lita Jarrett, Miss Meredith Elliott, Mr. Edwin Smith, and Mr. Robert Poole, all of whom artistically interpreted the music allotted to them. There was a choir of 150 voices, under the composer's direction, and the accompaniments were played upon organ, pianoforte, and trumpet, by Messrs. J. R. Griffiths, F. G. Shinn, A.C.O., and Alder respectively. The libretto was written and compiled by Mr. James Shepherd, and each part of the Oratorio was introduced by the Rev. Newman Hall, LL.B., who read a concise statement of the argument.

MR. ERNEST LAKE gave the second of a series of Sacred Recitals for the people at All Saints' Church, Kensington Park, on Sunday, the 1st ult. The programme comprised violin solos by Herr Louis River—Romance in G (Beethoven) and Larghetto in B flat (Mozart); arias by Miss Leslie Trowbridge, "O rest in the Lord" (Mendelssohn) and "Glory to Thee" (Gounod), and by Mr. Albert Reakes, "There is a green hill" (Gounod) and "Les Rameaux" (Faure), the latter with violin obbligato. The organ solos given by Mr. Ernest Lake were Grand Toccata and Fugue in D minor (J. S. Bach), Mélodie in A flat (Guilmant), and Andante and Allegro (F. E. Bache). The Recitals will be continued on the first Sunday of each month after Evensong.

THE Highbury Philharmonic Society performed a varied and attractive programme at its fourth Concert, on the 23rd ult. The bold essay of executing Beethoven's A major Symphony (No. 7), was doubtless due to the initiative of the new Conductor, Mr. Gilbert H. Betjemann; anyhow, it was fully justified by the result, a capital rendering affording manifest enjoyment to the crowded audience. The choir distinguished itself in a selection from Handel's "L'Allegro," the solo numbers having for interpreters Miss Florence Monk, Mr. Charles Chilley, and Mr. Frank Ward. Another vocalist who appeared was Miss Marguerite Hall, a sympathetic young artist, who sang a couple of songs, with orchestra, from the pen of Mr. G. R. Betjemann.

MR. LOARING, F.C.O., gave a Recital on the fine organ at St. Mark's, Walworth, on Wednesday evening, the 11th ult. The programme contained selections from the works of Handel, Bach, Mendelssohn, Rossini, &c., his playing being much admired by a large and appreciative congregation. On the 17th, Mr. Loaring gave a Recital on the new organ built by Mr. Speechly at the Presbyterian Church, Hackney Downs. He displayed the fine qualities of the instrument to great advantage. Among many interesting items the programme included his own "Bride's" March, Handel's Organ Concerto (No. 5), Rondo de Campanelli (Morandi), and a Fugue on the name of Bach.

MISS ALICE BOCQUET gave a Concert on Monday, the 9th ult., at the Brixton Hall, when she was assisted by Miss Agnes Larkcom, Miss Mary Morgan, Madame Riechelmann, Mr. Musgrave Tufnail, Mr. J. S. Murdoch, and Mr. Henry Guy (vocalists). Miss Clara Titterton (violin) and Mrs. E. A. Swan (pianoforte) gave several selections on their respective instruments. The Concert-giver had a most cordial reception, her rendering of songs by Goring Thomas and Roedel being much admired. In addition to the above-mentioned artists, Mr. J. K. Boddy gave a recitation, and the Hattonian Quartet, under the direction of Mr. Warren Tear, rendered several glees in a most acceptable manner.

THE Victoria Musical Society (in connection with the Early Closing Association) gave an Evening Concert at the Portman Rooms (late Madame Tussaud's), Baker Street, W., on the 13th ult. "The Fairy Ring," by Mr. W. H. Cummings, and a selection of part-songs and solos were performed. The Conductor was Mr. Leonard Venables, and the accompanist Mr. H. Hodge. The West-End Band (formed by the employés of Messrs. Marshall and Snelgrove) performed a selection of pieces, under the direction of Mr. A. C. Bollen.

MR. FRANK PRIDMORE gave a Concert in St. James's Boys' Schoolroom, on Tuesday, the 24th ult. The performers were Madame Whitfield Rose, Madame Annie Ryall, Miss Louisa Robins, L.A.M., Mr. A. F. Pinnington, Mr. C. Gooding, Mr. F. Thring, and Mr. Frank Pridmore. Violin solos were contributed by Miss Alice Fuller, and Mr. J. A. Smith recited. Mr. Pridmore was enthusiastically recalled with the composer, Mr. Ernest E. Vinen, for a new song entitled "Weary and sad at noontide" (first time of performance). Miss Pridmore presided at the piano.

THE first Concert of the present season of the Choral Society was given at the Elliott Rooms, Leytonstone, on the 9th ult., when a very interesting programme of madrigals and part-songs by Leslie, Fanning, Barnby, and other composers was given by the choir. The soloists were Madame Adeline Vaudrey and Mr. Charles Strong. The choir has now entered upon its sixth season, and has won a reputation for its rendering of part-songs and madrigals of the old and modern school of English music under its Conductor, Mr. J. W. Ulyett.

THE official list of subjects, prizes, conditions, and adjudicators at the National Eisteddfod of Wales, to be held at Wrexham in the autumn, has just been issued. Competitions in music for voices and instruments, as usual, are among the chief features of attraction. Prizes of one to one hundred and fifty pounds are offered for excellence in the several departments. Messrs. F. H. Cowen, A. J. Caldicott, John Thomas, David Jenkins, D. Emlyn Evans, and Charles Godfrey are the adjudicators.

THE Grosvenor Choral Society gave their 191st Monthly Concert at the Grosvenor Hall, on Friday evening, the 20th ult., when a miscellaneous selection of part-songs, appropriate to the season, was performed. The soloists were Miss A. A. Hora, Miss Kelly, Miss Bond, Mr. Harry Ward, Mr. John Bartlett, Mr. H. Davis, Mr. A. Roach, and Mr. Reynolds. Mr. Williams gave a concertina solo, accompanied by his daughter; Mrs. T. P. Frame presided at the piano, and Mr. David Woodhouse conducted.

THOSE of our readers for whom the question of the movements in favour of the establishment and employment of brass bands has an interest, will be glad to have their attention called to a correspondence in The British Bandsman, for January, between the paper and the Secretary of the National Sunday League, relative to Sunday Band music for the people. There is also a suggestion for the establishment of a club for musicians in the same number, which is worthy of attention.

THE third annual Concert in aid of the Choir Fund of St. Saviour's Church, Aberdeen Park, took place at the Highbury Athenæum, on the 18th ult., when Handel's "Messiah" was given with full orchestra and chorus, numbering nearly 250 performers. The soloists were Miss Annie Lea, Miss Lena Law, Mr. Henry Beaumont, and Mr. Frank Ward. Mr. Solomon gave an excellent rendering of the obbligato to "The trumpet shall sound," and Mr. Alfred J. Dye officiated as Conductor.

ON Monday, the 16th ult., Mr. Volanti Armitage gave his first Grand Evening Concert in the Drill Hall, Bermondsey. The artists were Madame Adelina Vaudrey, Miss Rose Moss, Madame Kate Heath; Messrs. John Lovett, Joseph A. Dunn, Kelson Trueman, F. Frampton, Ernest E. Vinen (solo pianoforte), Daniel Cleugh (solo violin), John Wilmot (viola), William Cleugh (violin-cello), Master Arthur Hill, and V. Armitage; accompanists, Messrs. V. Armitage and Ernest E. Vinen.

THE first Concert of the Bayswater Choral Society was given in the Lecture Room of Craven Hill Congregational Church, Lancaster Gate, W., on the 17th ult., when Mendelssohn's 42nd Psalm, Weber's "Jubilee" Cantata, and a miscellaneous selection of solos and part-songs were rendered. The solo vocalists were Mrs. Stanesby, Mr. Henry Beaumont, Mr. R. Rudd, and Mr. J. R. Williams. The accompanists were Mrs. Layton (piano) and Mr. W. Newberry (harmonium). Conductor, Mr. Fred. W. Noakes.

MR. AND MRS. HENSCHEL commenced another series of their agreeable Vocal Recitals at the Princes' Hall, on the 25th inst. The lyrics of four countries were laid under contribution, and the utmost diversity was given to the programme, the selections varying from the airs of Handel and Haydn, and the Lieder of Schubert and Brahms, to the national ditties of Scotland. There was a very large and highly appreciative audience.

MR. G. AUGUSTUS HOLMES gave an Organ Recital in St. George's Church, Camberwell, on Sunday, the 15th ult. The programme included Mendelssohn's Second Sonata, Allegretto in B flat (Lemmens), and March in B flat (Silas). Vocal music was furnished by Miss Rose Moss and Mr. Arthur Charles. Mr. A. Gambier Holmes also gave a violin solo. These Recitals take place on the third Sunday afternoon in each month.

AN interesting Recital was given to a large audience on the 17th ult., by Mr. H. W. Weston, F.C.O., of Balham, at St. Nicholas, Cole Abbey, E.C., when the programme comprised Dr. J. F. Bridge's Organ Sonata in D, Bach's Prelude and Fugue in G, with pedal solo; an excellent Concerto by Corelli, and works by Saint-Saëns, Lemmens, Dubois, &c.

THE prospectus of the National Concert Hall Company, Limited, printed in our advertising columns, will be read with much interest. There can be no doubt but that there is a distinct lack of concert hall accommodation in the metropolis, with its vast area and enormous number of inhabitants, many of whom are counted not only among the lovers, but also among the patrons of music.

MR. ALFRED CONSTABLE gave his first annual Concert, at St. James's Hall, Forest Hill, on Tuesday, the 3rd ult., when an excellent programme was rendered by the following artists:—Miss Annie Swinfen, Miss Edith Drew,

Mr. R. E. Miles, Mr. Oakley Parrott (violin), Mr. T. Avant (pianoforte), Mr. Scott Edwards (recitations). The Conductors were Mr. W. W. Hedgcock and Mr. A. Furse.

A CONCERT was given at Brompton Hospital on the 17th ult., under the direction of Mr. Churchill Sibley, who was assisted by Mdlle. Alice Roselli, Miss Ina Hadden, Miss Mary Leonard, Signor Villa, Master C. Thomas (pianoforte), and Master Fussell (violin). Mr. Churchill Sibley accompanied with great taste, and the whole performance gave great pleasure to the patients and nurses.

AT the Working Men's College, Great Ormond Street, on the 14th ult., Coward's historical Cantata "Magna Charta" was produced by the Bloomsbury Choral Association, under the conductorship of Mr. Charles Iseard. Miss A. Cowtan was the pianist; Miss Margery Allen, Mr. J. H. Mullerhausen, and Mr. Charles Prickett the soloists.

ON Tuesday, the 10th ult., Mr. Fountain Meen gave an Organ Recital at Union Chapel, Islington, the programme consisting of works by Bach, Hamilton Clarke, W. S. Hoyte, Widor, Dubois, Beethoven, and Meyerbeer. The vocalist was Madame Antoinette Sterling, who sang songs by Schubert, Cowen, and Sullivan.

A VERY successful Concert was given at the People's Palace, on the 11th ult., when the performers were Miss C. Dowle, Miss Henden Warde, Mr. Thurley Beale, the White Rose Quartet (Messrs. Viney, Merrett, Thompson, and McKenzie), Herr Poznanski (violinist), and Miss Adela Duckham and Mr. Orton Bradley accompanists.

THE Committee of the Purcell Society met on Monday, the 23rd ult., and decided that the publication [of Purcell's works in full score should be at once proceeded with. A sufficient, though not a large, number of subscriptions have been promised, and Mr. Cummings has undertaken to act as Editor for the Society.

AT the Wesleyan Church, Willesden Junction, on the 16th ult., an Organ Recital was given by Mr. Arthur C. Tattersall, Organist of St. Alphege, London Wall. Pieces by Rink, Smart, Mendelssohn, Bach, Wély, Handel, Gounod, and Tattersall were performed. Miss Florence Lulman was the vocalist.

MISS LAURA ALEXANDRINA SMITH, whose interesting work "The Music of the Waters"—Songs of the sailors of all nations—will shortly be issued by Messrs. Kegan, Paul and Trench, is now engaged upon a collection of the Romany Songs of all lands.

MR. GEORGE ASPINALL and Mr. Charles Copland had the honour of singing before H.I.M. the Emperor of Brazil and his suite at Cannes, on the 21st ult. His Imperial Majesty expressed himself much pleased with our young English vocalists, and personally thanked them.

THE report which has been circulated in several American newspapers, to the effect that Herr Joachim has been stricken with paralysis, and will not be able to play any more, is, upon inquiry in the best informed quarters, affirmed to be absolutely without foundation in fact.

AT the Examination of Pianoforte Tuners, held in Regent Hall, London, in January, the following passed successfully, and have been awarded the Certificate of Qualification:—D. Davis, Longton, and T. Renshaw, Mansfield.

WE are happy to say that Sir Arthur Sullivan is now convalescent, and in accordance with the doctor's advice will depart for the South of Europe to recuperate his strength.

ON the six Monday afternoons during the coming Lent, Mr. Albert E. Bishop will give a series of Recitals at St. Mary Abchurch, City, entitled "Six hours with the Organ Compositions of J. S. Bach."

MR. SAMSON FOX, C.E., the founder of the Leeds Forge Company, has given a donation of £30,000 to the Royal College of Music. This sum will be expended upon the building of a permanent home for the Institution.

A SERIES of four Popular Concerts of Chamber Music is to be given in the Vestry Hall, Haverstock Hill, on Friday evenings during the months of January, February, and March.

MR. JOSEPH BENNETT has undertaken to read a Paper on "The Possibilities of Welsh Music" at the April meeting of the Honourable Cymrodorian Society.

MR. W. S. HOYTE has been appointed a Professor of the Pianoforte to the Guildhall School of Music.

MR. BARTON MCCUGKIN will return to England from his American tour in June.

REVIEWS.

Harold. A Dramatic Cantata. Written by the Rev. F. W. Vernham. Composed by J. F. H. Read.
[Novello, Ewer and Co.]

THIS work was performed for the first time under its composer's direction at the Walthamstow Musical Festival in November last. A description of Mr. Vernham's libretto and brief notice of the music appeared in THE MUSICAL TIMES of the following month. Mr. Read's score is divided into eighteen numbers, opening with a chorus of maidens, "Swift the flying shuttle speeds," in which the whirling sound of weaving is depicted by the accompanying violins, while the alto voices mark the rhythm with a reiterated "clang." No. 2 is an Aria for Edith (soprano), with chorus, "Merrily the throstle sings," a graceful and melodious setting of Lord Lytton's interpolated verses. In No. 3 the male chorus enters for the first time with a bold martial strain, worked up with increasing force, then dying away as the Saxons withdraw and the Maidens echo their war-cry, "Strike for England's Harold!" No. 4, a Trio for Edith, Hilda (contralto), and Harold (tenor), contains much suave, flowing writing for the voices, while the instrumentation reveals a liberal use of Leitmotives. An important section is the succeeding "Incantation" for Hilda, culminating in a subdued, mysterious chorus of unseen Spirits. A curious feature in Duke William's solo "Nobles of Normandy," is the continuous fanfare of trumpets that accompanies the declamatory utterances of the baritone voice. The re-entry of the strings in the succeeding duet for William and Odo (bass) forms a grateful relief, further heightened by the almost whispered chant of the Priests, "Domine, quis habitabit." The Scene of the Oath is treated with considerable dramatic force, the writing for male chorus here being very bold and massive. No. 10, which opens the Scene of the Coronation, is an extended duet for Edith and Harold, leading up to a spirited Processional March. A brief unaccompanied chorus, "Strong is Thy hand," forms the Anthem, which is followed by the entire Coronation service, very effectively treated. No. 13, a chorus for male voices, affords a vivid contrast between the religious demeanour of the Normans and the carousal of the Saxons on the eve of battle. After another long duet for Edith and Harold, accompanied towards the end by the warning voices of the unseen Spirits, we come to the Epilogue, which consists of a solemn Funeral March, a "De Profundis" for bass solo and chorus, and final choruses of consolation and jubilant praise. The writing here is full of contrapuntal skill and rich, massive harmonies, bringing to a conclusion with imposing effect a work in which there is much solid merit and constant evidence of scholarly resource.

Young People's History of Music; with Biographies of famous Musicians. By James C. Macy.
[Boston: Oliver Ditson and Co.]

IT has often been said that the best critics of children's books are the children themselves; but although this may be true with respect to works written for their amusement, it can scarcely be asserted that those intended to convey an accurate knowledge of facts can be satisfactorily valued by these inexperienced censors. The majority of the authors of such treatises generally say too much or too little, so that their books are either dull and wearisome or fragmentary and tantalising; and those who have the care of "young people," therefore, should carefully gauge the worth of a work before admitting it into their school library. The author of the little manual before us says in his preface: "The historical part of the book, though necessarily condensed, deals with all the most important events in musical history"; but unfortunately this very bold declaration is by no means carried out. Decidedly the early chapters, treating of the ancient church music, the many systems of notation, the Troubadours and Minnesingers, music printing, &c., are the best; but when we come to the Biographies we find them not only brief—which of course we must expect them to be—but filled with irrelevant matter, to the exclusion of that which is really important. For example, we are told that Handel wrote "The Messiah," but no other work of his is even mentioned, except the harpsichord piece known as "The Harmonious Blacksmith," and this is only dragged in for the sake of recounting the non-sensical story about the composer's being "overtaken by a shower" and seeking shelter in Powell's shop, where the noise of the anvil and hammer suggested the idea of the composition. In proof, too, that this omission of any allusion to the other grand creations of Handel does not arise from want of space, we may add that the "biography" includes the well-known anecdote of Janson, the house painter, who, being asked by Handel (hearing that he could sing at sight) to try some of his music, replied that he could sing "at sight," but not at "first sight." As a rule, most of the knowledge especially desired by students will not be found in this book. Schubert, it is said was, "at the houses of the great, reserved and shy," but little is recorded of his compositions, and not one is named. Schumann, we are told, "practised the piano so industriously that he injured one of his hands, which prevented him from ever becoming a piano player"; no work, however, of the many he wrote is even alluded to by its title. But we have some information which will scarcely be met with in other biographies, for Rossini is credited as being the first "who gave to the chorus and orchestra the importance in opera which they have at the present day." Disappointing as the work is on the whole, it has nevertheless some good points, several musical illustrations in the opening chapters, and portraits of the composers, rendering it additionally attractive to the "young people" for whom it is especially written; and we can even imagine that, were a second edition called for, a few alterations, judiciously made, would convert it into a tolerably fair juvenile text-book.

The Art of Respiration (Management of the Breath). By B. Lützen. [E. Donajowski.]

RESPIRATION is a natural inheritance and requires no education. When the voice is employed in singing or in elocution, the management of the breath and the subjugation of respiration to a definite purpose is a matter of art. The author of this little pamphlet offers a few hints on the subject to students of singing and elocution, to clergymen, and to public speakers, based upon the authority of the most eminent physiologists of the voice. There is little that is new to be said upon the subject as far as the physiological side of the question is concerned, and of this fact our author makes due acknowledgment by freely quoting the received authorities. On the practical side of the matter, such as concerns singers and speakers, there are many useful hints which may prove to be valuable as a guide to those who desire to improve upon nature, and for those the book may serve as a help. The best way to manage the breath is to leave it alone. It should be automatic. So soon as attention is drawn to its production, it becomes laboured and painful alike to the hearer as to the exerciser. Vocal exercises which shall teach the best way of phrasing are more valuable than a whole tirade of precepts concerning abdominal, diaphragmatic, collar-bone, or clavicular breathing. Our author, when he states that "one of the reasons why there are more good and sound voices to be found in the lower than in the upper classes, is that workmen and people living mostly in the open air use their voices without restraint," solves the question of the advisability of interfering with the breath for the purposes of singing or speaking. If a good voice "comes by nature," the business of a good teacher should be to direct the owner into the right channel, to employ it intelligently, and to cultivate natural gifts in a natural way, and not according to any fanciful system better calculated to hinder than to help the student.

The Widow of Zarephath. By Alan Gray.
[Novello, Ewer and Co.]

THE compilation of the words of this work, which is called a "Reading in church recitation, with exposition in chorus," has been made by the experienced hand of the Rev. J. Powell Metcalfe, M.A. It is novel in idea, and is intended as an attempt to carry out the "Reading of the Great Bible" with the aid of music. The story selected for the reading has its narrative based upon the old church monotone with the traditional inflections, sustained and illustrated by organ accompaniment. The choruses are designed to enforce the salient points of the story. The construction of the book is excellent as a whole. It is, however, in our opinion, a grave mistake to introduce any words from the New Testament as gloss to the story, and the texts "The trying of your faith," "The wind bloweth where it listeth," and others as illustrating the obedience of Elijah to the command of the Lord do not fall gratefully upon the mind in connection with the story. The first makes a pretty choral-like chorus and the second a graceful solo for soprano, with a chorus, but their applicability is doubtful and questionable. Mr. Gray's music is pleasing if not strikingly original. In his desire to be interesting he seems to pose for prettiness, and some of his themes—in old fashioned ballad form—fit the words as uncomfortably as some of the words fit the subject. The idea is very good and will doubtless command a welcome. It may be worked with considerable profit in similar stories from the Bible, and so promote the great object which is sought to be gained.

Eve. A Mystery, in three parts. Poem by Louis Gallet. English version by F. Hueffer. Music by J. Massenet. [Joseph Williams.]

WE have not yet had a performance in London of one of M. Massenet's "Mysteries," and it is easy to understand the reluctance of choral societies to present the public with works in which sacred characters are travestied in a manner likely to be regarded as blasphemous. In any case they could never be given with stage accessories as in Paris and Brussels. Some two years ago we noticed the English edition of "Marie Magdelene," an earlier work than the present, and laid out on a larger scale. "Eve" is divided into three parts and an epilogue, called respectively the Birth of Woman, Eve in Solitude, the Fall, and the Curse. It should be remarked that the poet identifies original sin with love, and the language is for the most part that of glowing passion and sensuous word painting. The translator has well preserved the spirit of the original, and, rightly enough, has not thought it his duty to improve upon it. Those who are acquainted with M. Massenet's music, and with the modern French school of composition generally, will guess that "Eve" presents the usual characteristics of that school. Dreamy voluptuous melodies, tremolando passages for the strings, and sweeping Arpeggi predominate in the earlier part, and after the Fall, the music becomes dramatic and realistic in the highest degree. It would, of course, be absurd to look for the essential features of oratorio—breadth, power, and fugal writing. The work is highly esteemed in the land of its birth, but public taste must undergo a considerable change if it is to become popular in this country.

The Angels of the Bells. A short Cantata for Female Voices. Written by Helen M. Burnside. Composed by Myles B. Foster. [Novello, Ewer and Co.]

THE argument of this charming little Cantata is thus stated by the composer: "Three new bells have been presented to a church to complete the full peal. They are christened 'Joy,' 'Love,' and 'Peace,' and are to be rung for the first time on Christmas morning. The sponsor angels are hovering around them, Peace being the first to touch her bell with her palm-branch, as the sun rises." The opening chorus, marked Allegretto gioioso, is melodious, graceful, and thoroughly sympathetic with the subject. Sufficient contrast is gained by simple means, and the harmonies throughout are most appropriate. This is succeeded by a placid solo for the first soprano (Joy), and then the second soprano and contralto (Love and Peace) unite in a brief duet, followed by solos for all the voices, that for contralto leading into a very effective little duet for second soprano and contralto. Closing in E flat, a short Recitative in G ushers in the final chorus, in the same key, a jubilant and attractive composition, which, without any undue pretence, undoubtedly evidences the hand of a skilled master, and brings to a satisfactory conclusion one of the most pleasing and artistic little Cantatas for female voices which has lately come before us.

The Auld Scotch Songs, harmonised and arranged. By Sinclair Dunn. Part I. [Glasgow: Morison Brothers.]

THE opportunity of obtaining twelve Scotch songs of the most popular character, with pianoforte accompaniments, for sixpence, is temptation enough even to Scotchmen to "gar the bawbees bang." The "songs" in this, the first part of an intended series, are well printed it is true, but the manner in which they are edited and provided with accompaniments is scarcely so artistic as might have been. After the somewhat self-sufficient preface, in which the editor deprecates "the many indifferent collections which have been foisted on the public by those who really do not understand our national songs and their treatment," the "people" for whom this edition is ostensibly prepared have a right to expect something better than the work done by George Farquhar Graham, George Alexander Macfarren, John Muir Wood, and others among the moderns, to say nothing of the somewhat blind labours of Haydn, Beethoven, Kozeluch, Pleyel, and others of the ancients, whose arrangements have been "foisted on the public." The only thing in which the present editor is in advance of all the above-named musicians is in the assumption of his own superiority.

Musical Dictation. A Practical Guide for Musical Students. By Frédéric Louis Ritter. (Music Primers, No. 29, Part I.) [Novello, Ewer and Co.]

THIS latest addition to Novello's most useful series of Primers gives examples of musical sentences for dictation culled from composers of all nationalities and epochs. In this Dr. Ritter supplies a want distinctly felt, not only by teachers, but also by examiners, who in the present day are almost as numerous. The reason which prompted the thought of writing the book, as stated by the author, will be admitted by all who have thought upon the matter. "I have almost invariably found that even able pianoforte or vocal students well grounded in the rudiments of music, when asked to write down from memory the melodic passage of the first bar only of the simple piece or song they have just been playing or singing for me correctly by heart, can absolutely not do it; to fix the respective pitch of the different notes of the melodic passage, and especially the division of time, presents unsurmountable obstacles to them." Other teachers have doubtless felt the same. The existence of such a book was a necessity which would have become pressing sooner or later. It has now appeared, and will unquestionably satisfy the growing need.

Original Compositions for the Organ. By Otto Dienel. No. 11. [Novello, Ewer and Co.]

WE have so frequently drawn attention to the merit of Herr Dienel's organ compositions that there is no occasion to speak further of them in a general sense. In the present number the Berlin Organist has given us a Second Concert-Satz (movement) in D minor (Op. 22). By employing the term concert-piece the composer may wish it to be understood that his work is not to be regarded as a church voluntary. It is certainly bright and animated, but not by any means so trivial as many pieces by French composers which are very popular with congregations. The work starts with a vigorous Allegro based on one persistent figure, momentarily relieved by a quiet second subject in the relative major. A change of measure from 2-2 to 6-4 serves to introduce a new theme in F minor, which is used as the exposition of a fugue. Science, however, proceeds no further, and the fugue theme is blended with the original figure, and has an important share in the working up of the peroration in the tonic major. The piece has one important recommendation: its difficulties are so moderate as to be easily overcome by players of ordinary skill.

Magnificat and Nunc dimittis in B flat. By W. G. Wood. [Novello, Ewer and Co.]

CONSIDERING the vast number of new settings of the Canticles which are now appearing, it might be thought impossible for a composer to impart any individuality to work of this kind without passing the bounds of simplicity necessary to be observed in music intended for ordinary church use. Mr. Wood, however, has shown in this service what earnest musicianship can accomplish in the face of difficulty. His voice parts are studiously easy and straightforward; his accompaniment, though mostly independent of them, is never florid nor complex; and yet his music is marked by freshness and freedom of ideas, sufficient to stamp it as a noteworthy production of its kind. The composer writes with force and dignity, but as a nineteenth century musician. We therefore heartily recommend his Service to those who recognise the possibility of progress without revolution.

Andante Cantabile in F; Zephyrs. By John Cheshire.
[A. Hammond and Co.]

THE composer of these pieces is well known as one of our leading harp players, and we are glad to welcome him in another domain of art. They are remarkably unpretentious examples of drawing-room pianoforte music, but none the less agreeable on that account. The Andante consists of a staid, semi-religious theme, subjected to some variations of the simplest character, the placid character of the opening being scarcely modified to the end. "Zephyrs," as its name indicates, is of a lighter character, a tuneful theme in 6-8 time being decked out with showy but by no means difficult arpeggi, chiefly for the right hand, an energetic peroration bringing the piece to an effective close.

A Selection of Movements from Dvorák's Oratorio "St. Ludmila." Arranged for the Organ by George C. Martin, Mus. Doc. [Novello, Ewer and Co.]

It need scarcely be said that the broad Handelian character of the music of Dvorák's Bohemian Oratorio renders it specially suitable for the purposes of organ transcription. In the present selection we have the beautiful soprano airs, "I long with childlike longing" and "O God, grant me," and the contralto air "Thy leading would I had not followed," together with the massive choruses "The gods are ever near" and "Mighty Lord." The name of Dr. Martin is sufficient guarantee for the excellence of the arrangements, and organists will find these pieces an extremely effective addition to their stock of voluntaries.

Magnificat and Nunc dimittis, set to Music in the key of F. By J. Baptiste Calkin. [Novello, Ewer and Co.]

MR. CALKIN always writes interesting vocal music. This setting of the Canticles used in the Evening Service of the Anglican Church is no less attractive and effective than his former contributions for a like purpose. The words are duly emphasised, the melodies and harmonies are dignified and noble, and the organ part designed with the skill of one who knows the power and capabilities of the instrument for which he writes. The music, though essentially modern in character, is not unworthy to rank with the choicest labours of the best Cathedral writers.

Pianoforte Music. By Louis H. Meyer.
[Agate and Co.]

THE composer of these several pieces writes with a facile pen, and so invests his work with a certain charm for those to whom originality of melody is a secondary consideration in music. In "Titania," a Scène de Ballet; in "La Belle Rosière," a Gavotte poétique; and "Les Beaux Soldats," a Marche Militaire, the rhythms are clever and attractive, the passages are well laid out for the hand, and the pieces are good as lessons for school purposes. So far they may fulfil all the conditions of their being, but it will be necessary for the composer to exhibit more individuality and independence of thought to qualify himself for a high place among writers of music for the pianoforte, which should find a place out of the schoolroom.

The King shall rejoice. Anthem. By Sir Robert Stewart. [Novello, Ewer and Co.]

THIS anthem was composed especially for the Jubilee celebration, but it contains no reference to that event, and the words being taken from the Psalms and 1 Kings, it would be suitable for general use, and particularly for the annual recurrence of Accession Day. Formally it consists of a short bass solo, a melodious quartet, and a lengthy and well developed fugal chorus in the best style of modern church music. It should be mentioned that the anthem opens with the first strain of the National Anthem, but this can of course be omitted if desired.

Andante and Allegro Scherzoso. Composed for the Pianoforte by Michael Watson. [E. Ascherberg and Co.]

THE composer of this piece has devoted so much of his time to writing what is called "teaching music" that we may expect him now to have fully gauged the taste of his patrons. The greater credit then is due to him for experimenting upon a somewhat higher class of composition and we hope that he may give us more specimens of this style as good as the Andante and Allegro Scherzoso now before us.

The Harvest truly is great. Anthem. By W. W. Pearson. [Novello, Ewer and Co.]

ALTHOUGH quite suitable for Harvest Thanksgivings, this short, full anthem is equally intended for Ember days, mission services, &c. It is studiously simple, and has no special characteristics on which to dwell. The consecutive fifths between treble and bass near the end of the first section may be intentional, and, according to some modern theorists, are justifiable. The effect is unquestionably bold, but whether it is unpleasing must be a matter of opinion.

Musical Directory, Annual, and Almanack for 1888.
[Rudall, Carte and Co.]

A WORD of commendation is due in favour of this, the oldest work of the kind still continuing its useful course. This is the thirty-sixth annual issue, and its value is recognised by the profession and others. There is a capital summary of the year's music, a list of patents taken out during the year, besides the customary matter expected in every well designed directory, annual, and almanack.

Cavatina in F, for Violoncello, with Pianoforte Accompaniment. Composed by Francesco Berger.
[Novello, Ewer and Co.]

AMATEURS and professional players in search of a simple, effective, yet unpretentious piece, will be glad to make acquaintance with this Cavatina. It is well written, and exhibits many musicianly qualities, not the least of which is a feeling for graceful and tender melody, and the charms and powers of form. An arrangement for the violin is in course of publication.

The Choral Instructor for Treble Voices. By Charles Vincent, Mus. Doc. [Novello, Ewer and Co.]

THIS is a handy little work which will be found useful for the object for which it is written. It does not break new ground, but its brevity will commend it for general use. A few part-songs; "Merry June," a vocal polka; "The wind is sighing," "O birdie stay," unison songs; and "Blow, soft winds," a vocal valse by the same composer, may be used as supplements to the instruction book.

The American Organ Journal. Edited by J. Munro Coward. [Metzler and Co.]

THE thirteenth number of this serial publication contains several interesting and useful pieces arranged for the American organ, among others Jackson's Te Deum and Jubilate, beloved of congregations in times past and still in favour; besides compositions by H. M. Higgs, Arthur Sullivan, Glover, Létébure-Wély, and Gounod, all well and skilfully adapted.

In Grotto Cool. By George J. Bennett. (Novello's Collection of Trios, Quartets, &c., for Female Voices, No. 207.)
[Novello, Ewer and Co.]

THIS little trio for female voices is not only well designed, but is gracefully set out for the voices, and, with the pianoforte part, forms an elegant and pleasing work. It is altogether a favourable specimen of the musical mind of the author.

When the lamp is shattered. Song. Composed by Landon Ronald. [Metzler and Co.]

THIS pleasing little composition is confessedly the work of a very young composer, yet it exhibits considerable taste and expression, a reasonable reading of the words, and a close regard to the needs of the singer.

How to Play the Fiddle; or, Hints to Beginners on the Violin. By Henry William Gresswell and George Gresswell. Second Edition. [W. Reeves.]

THE title of this book is tempting enough to sell many editions. Numbers of people, anxious to acquire the accomplishment suggested, would buy the book and set to work to study its contents in the hope of attaining their object. They will be much interested in the compilation. The authors have successfully striven to make their pages attractive by means of extracts from good and bad authors who have written upon the subject, and by the introduction of anecdotes and quotations from various poets relative to music or anything else. The pages are worthy of perusal because they are brightly put together, but, as far as the fulfilment of the title is concerned, they are of no practical value. Those, therefore, who wish to learn "How to play the Fiddle" had better buy some other books.

FOREIGN NOTES.

THE fiftieth anniversary of the first performance of Lortzing's popular comic opera "Czar und Zimmermann," was commemorated on December 22 last, by festive performances of the work in all parts of Germany, one of the few exceptions having been the Royal Opera of the capital, where, on the day in question, "Il Trovatore" was given. The fact has been much commented upon by the German press, as furnishing fresh proof of the indifference with which the claims of national composers are regarded by an institution taking the nominal lead in operatic matters in the Fatherland. In the present instance, however, the Berlin Opera may be said merely to perpetuate the neglect shown to Lortzing by his countrymen during his lifetime, the composer having been suffered to die, in 1851, almost literally of starvation.

A most successful first performance of Wagner's "Die Meistersinger" took place last month at Cassel, the difficult work having been most carefully prepared for several months past under direction of Capellmeister Treiber, of the Hof-Theater.

Berlioz's "Requiem" has been performed three times within the last six weeks at Berlin, under the conductorship of Professor Xaver Scharwenka, but has failed to attract any very marked attention. The performances are said to have been excellent.

Peter Tschaikowsky, the eminent Russian composer, just now on a visit in Germany, has met with an enthusiastic reception at a concert recently given by the Leipzig Liszt-Verein, on which occasion several chamber-compositions from his pen—notably a Trio (Op. 50) and a String Quartet in D major—were included in the programme. During the present month the artist will produce a number of his own compositions at Berlin. "Tschaikowsky," says a well-known critic in the Allgemeine Musik Zeitung, "undoubtedly takes the lead in the most modern school of Russian composers, the younger members whereof he distinctly surpasses in clearness and maturity of conception combined with brilliant imaginative powers."

Herr Anton Wagner has been awarded the first prize (3,000 florins) for his design of a statue to be erected to Mozart in the Austrian capital. Herr Wagner is also the sculptor of the statues of Haydn and of Dittersdorf which adorn the Viennese Opera House.

It is stated in German papers that Herr Josef Sucher, for many years the highly-esteemed orchestral Conductor of the Hamburg Stadt-Theater, has accepted a similar post at the Royal Opera of Berlin. Madame Rosa Sucher (favourably known also to London audiences) has, on the other hand, renewed her contract with Herr Pollini, of the Hamburg Theatre, under, it is said, most brilliant conditions, for the next three years.

Peter Cornelius's comic opera "Der Barbier von Bagdad," lately included with ever-increasing success in the répertoires of several German lyrical stages, is now also in course of remounting at the Weimar Hof-Theater, where, some thirty years since, under the auspices of Franz Liszt, it was first brought out and met with an almost complete fiasco. Cornelius died in 1874. Another interesting revival is about to take place at the Weimar Theatre—viz., of Pergolesi's "La serva padrona," one of the gems of the old opera buffa (composed in 1731) consisting of two dramatis personæ and an orchestra of stringed instruments only.

The new German Theatre at Prague was inaugurated on the 5th ult. with Wagner's "Die Meistersinger." The performance, which is described as an excellent one, was most enthusiastically received by a crowded audience, the anticipated opposition on the part of the Czech element in the Bohemian capital being conspicuous by its absence. The new house is admitted on all hands to be an admirable structure, both from an architectural point of view and in its acoustic properties.

A street in the vicinity of the Berlin Thiergarten has lately been named "Richard Wagner Strasse."

A series of interesting articles concerning the history of Carl Maria von Weber's posthumous opera-fragment "Die drei Pintos," is just now being published in the Neue Zeitschrift für Musik, from the pen of the composer's grandson, Herr Carl von Weber, who is also the author of the completely revised libretto of the work, the musical portion whereof has recently been "completed" by Herr Mahler, of Leipzig. Without throwing, so far as they have appeared, much additional light upon the facts already known, the articles in question furnish an able and exhaustive resumé of the subject, the writer, inter alia, finally disposing of the oft-repeated assertion (originating in an erroneous statement made by the composer's widow), according to which Weber had brought the complete score of the "Pintos" with him to London, where it mysteriously disappeared after his death. The first performance of the attempted complete version of Weber's only comic opera was definitely announced to take place at the Leipzig Stadt-Theater on the 20th ult. Its result should either make or mar the courageous Herr Mahler's reputation.

A commemorative tablet has just been placed against the house No. 6, Unter den Tuchlauben, at Vienna, bearing the inscription: "Mozart resided in this house in the year 1781, where he composed his opera 'Die Entführung aus dem Serail.'"

A new statuette of Beethoven, modelled upon the well-known pen-and-ink portrait by Lyser, and reproducing more faithfully than any other the outward characteristics of the master's personality, has lately made its appearance in German shop windows, and finds ready buyers. The statuette is the work of the sculptor, Herr Landgrebe.

Herr Paul Peterich, a rising young sculptor, has been entrusted with the execution of the monument to be erected to Weber at his native Eutin, the design of which is said to be very graceful and poetically suggestive.

The new double-concerto, by Johannes Brahms, was performed for the first time in public at the Leipzig Gewandhaus, on New Year's day.

An Opera, "Die Camisarden," by Herr August Langert, met with conspicuous success last month at the Coburg Hof-Theater.

Herr Carl Formes, the well-known basso, is about to publish his "Reminiscences," which, considering the extensive artistic tours of the once popular singer, should prove to be interesting. Herr Formes has been established for some years past as singing master at San Francisco, and though over seventy years of age is still rendering good service to the art.

At a Concert given at Vienna last month by Madame Sophie Menter, the eminent pianist played amongst other pieces, no less than three pianoforte Concertos—viz., Beethoven's in E flat major, Liszt's in A major, and Rubinstein's in G major!

A new operetta, "Die Sieben Schwaben," has just been successfully brought out at the Berlin Friedrich-Wilhelmstadt Theatre, by Herr Carl Millöcker, the composer of the popular "Bettelstudent."

M. Lamoureux, the eminent Paris conductor, with an orchestra of ninety performers, will shortly undertake an artistic tour extending over Spain, Portugal, Russia, and England; the most important undertaking of its kind ever projected by a French orchestral body.

Madame Miolan-Carvalho, the eminent prima donna, and wife of the ex-director of the Paris Opera Comique, is about to establish a vocal academy in the French capital.

At the Paris Grand Opéra the performances have been for some time past confined to some seven or eight well-worn operatic works, pending the first production of M. Salvayre's new opera "La Dame de Monsoreau," for which elaborate preparations are being made, and which is expected to prove the great success of the present season. The date of its performance had, however, not yet been definitely fixed at the time of our going to press.

M. Sardou has completed the libretto of an opera, to be composed by M. Massenet, and which is to be performed next year as part of the festivities in connection with the International Exhibition. M. Sardou's work is entitled "Montezuma," and deals with the conquest of Mexico by the Spaniards.

A Society has just constituted itself at Paris "in aid of the development and renovation of the lyrical drama in France and French-speaking countries." It is the ambition of the Society, moreover, to establish a special theatre where composers of progressive tendencies could produce their own works, and where, more especially, "they would have a frequent opportunity of studying those leading stage works which have marked out a new path in the development of the modern music drama." M. Lamoureux has been elected President of the Society, among whose members may also be mentioned MM. Georges Dewal, Albert Dayrolles, Louis de Grammont, G. de Labruyère, Catulle Mendès, Georges Street, and Victor Wilder. The proceedings of the new Society, which manifestly owes its origin to the failure of the "Lohengrin" performances at the Eden Theatre some months since, will be followed with some interest by all amateurs.

A new opera, by Signor Mancinelli, entitled "I Ribelli," is shortly to be produced at the San Carlos Theatre of Lisbon.

According to a compilation of the Paris Le Ménestrel, the number of new operas and operettas actually produced in 1887 on the stages of Italy and Germany (including Austria) has been thirty-five and forty-eight respectively.

At Naples, Verdi's "Otello" is about to be performed at the San Carlo Theatre, while at the Teatro Nuovo the "Otello" by Rossini is to be given. In these circumstances, Il Trovatore suggests, Shakespeare's drama, upon which both operas are founded, might with advantage be produced at the third theatre of the town, the Fiorentini.

M. Paravey, formerly the director of the Grand Théâtre of Nantes, has succeeded M. Carvalho in the directorship of the Paris Opéra Comique.

Karl Goldmark's opera "Die Königin von Saba" has just been performed and very favourably received at the La Scala, of Milan, the composer being present. Madame Kupfer-Berger sang the title-rôle, Signor Novelli being the principal tenor, and Signor Faccio conducted. Goldmark's opera had already been represented in Italy—viz., at Bologna, in 1876.

At the Théâtre de la Monnaie, of Brussels, Ponchielli's "Gioconda" was produced for the first time, on December 28, as the first novelty of the present season. The work had been carefully prepared and well put on the stage, and was well received by an overflowing audience, M. Dupont conducting. Since the above date, the excellent performances of Wagner's "La Valkyrie" (M. Wilder's translation) have been resumed, and have apparently lost none of their popular attractions.

A new opera, "Edgar," by the young Maestro Giacomo Puccini (the composer of "Le Willi"), is being published by Ricordi, of Milan, and will shortly be brought out at La Scala. The following new works are to be produced in Italy during the forthcoming carnival—viz., "Nestorio," by Signor Gallignani (La Scala, Milan); "Diana d'Almeida," by Signor Ronco (Carlo Felice, Genoa); "Asraël," by the Maestro Franchetti (Teatro Municipale, Reggio d'Emilia); "Il Grembialino rosa," by Azzo Albertini (Castelfranco); and "Jacopo," by the Maestro Leonardo (Apollo Theatre, Rome).

Madame Adelina Patti gave her farewell Soirée at the San Carlos Theatre of Lisbon, on the 23rd ult., in Verdi's "Rigoletto." "The house," according to a correspondent, "presented a splendid appearance, all the boxes being decorated with the choicest of flowers, provided by the leading ladies of the city. Even on the stage the scene representing Gilda's home was also filled with flowers and living plants, and the theatre looked as if it had been touched by a magician's wand. At the conclusion of the opera the demonstrations of enthusiasm continued for at least twenty minutes."

A. M. Storch, a popular composer of male quartets, died at Vienna on December 31, aged seventy-five.

Professor Julius Sachs, pianist and composer of some merit, died at Frankfurt on December 28, aged fifty-seven.

Vilma von Voggenhuber, the highly-esteemed prima donna of the Berlin Royal Opera, whose impersonations of Wagnerian characters were more especially admired, died on the 11th ult., at Berlin. The deceased artist was born at Pesth in 1845.

Herr Christian Bernhard Klemm, the senior partner of the well-known music publishing firm of Leipzig, died, on the 3rd ult., at the age of seventy-six.

CORRESPONDENCE.

ITALIAN VIOLIN MAKERS.

TO THE EDITOR OF "THE MUSICAL TIMES."

SIR,—The name of Genova, of Turin, is, I think, quite unknown as an Italian violin maker. I have, however, a very fine violoncello, indubitably genuine, bearing this name, and think it is of sufficient interest to many of your readers to ask your insertion of this letter, with a view of ascertaining if any other specimens of this maker are known to exist. The instrument is of excellent model, beautiful varnish, and exceptional tone; and should anyone interested in Italian makers wish to see it, and will communicate with me, I shall have pleasure in making an appointment for its inspection.

I remain, Sir, obediently yours,

AMATEUR.

TO CORRESPONDENTS.

* * Notices of concerts, and other information supplied by our friends in the country, must be forwarded as early as possible after the occurrence; otherwise they cannot be inserted. Our correspondents must specifically denote the date of each concert, for without such date no notice can be taken of the performance.

Our correspondents will oblige by writing all names as clearly as possible, as we cannot be responsible for any mistakes that may occur.

Correspondents are informed that their names and addresses must accompany all communications.

We cannot undertake to return offered contributions; the authors, therefore, will do well to retain copies.

Notice is sent to all subscribers whose payment (in advance) is exhausted. The paper will be discontinued where the Subscription is not renewed. We again remind those who are disappointed in obtaining back numbers that, although the music is always kept in stock, only a sufficient quantity of the rest of the paper is printed to supply the current sale.

A COUNTRY ORGANIST should apply to a music-seller for the information he seeks.

A SUBSCRIBER.—The higher pitch is the Philharmonic. The C requiring 540 vibrations in a second. Scheibler's pitch, often called concert pitch, is C=528. French pitch C=522, or by equal temperament C=517.

FRANK E. B.—The Valse is published under the names of other composers besides Beethoven. Among the number Reissiger, whose work it probably is.

BRIEF SUMMARY OF COUNTRY NEWS.

We do not hold ourselves responsible for any opinions expressed in this Summary, as all the notices are either collated from the local papers or supplied to us by correspondents.

ABINGDON.—An Organ Recital was given in the Parish Church on the 12th ult., by Mr. H. R. Coudrey, of Windsor. The programme contained works by Berthold Tours, Bach, Batiste, G. M. Garrett, H. R. Coudrey, Mendelssohn, Alexandre Guilmant, and F. C. Bache.

BARROW-IN-FURNESS.—On Christmas Day part of The Messiah was given in St. George's Parish Church by the choir (augmented). The solos were taken by Miss S. Conway, Mrs. Dilks, Mr. J. Bryce, and Mr. Jemmison. Mr. G. Denholm Walker presided at the organ.—On the 15th ult. an Organ Recital was given after Evensong by Mr. G. Denholm Walker, which included works from Bach, Merkel, Lemmens, Guilmant, and Batiste.

BLACKBURN.—An excellent performance of The Messiah was given, on the 2nd ult., in James Street Congregational Church. Band and chorus of 105 performers. Miss Jessie Moorhouse, Miss Maude Yates, Mr. Butterworth, and Mr. Hesketh Meade sustained, with great acceptance, the principal parts. The choruses were much enjoyed. Organist, Mr. A. Miller; Conductor, Mr. W. H. Robinson.

BRIGHOUSE, YORKS.—Mendelssohn's St. Paul was given by the Choral Society, in the Town Hall, on December 28. The solos were sung by Miss Vinnie Beaumont, Mr. Holberry Hagyard, and Mr. Billington. Mr. Bowling led the band, Mr. Bickerdike was at the harmonium, and Mr. J. H. Pearson conducted.

CANTERBURY.—The Philharmonic Society gave a performance of Handel's Acis and Galatea and Mendelssohn's Athalie on the 24th ult., under the direction of Dr. Longhurst. Miss Agnes Larkom and Mr. Charles Kenningham sang the music allotted to the unfortunate lovers with excellent effect, the part of Polyphemus being taken by Mr. Rhodes, who was heartily applauded after an excellent rendering of "O ruddier than the cherry." Damon's two songs were given by the Rev. F. J. O. Helmore, although it seems strange that, in a Cathedral City, the services of a professional singer could not have been secured for this part. Mendelssohn's beautiful setting of Racine's tragedy and the story alike seemed to be in a language "not understood of the people" of Canterbury, possibly because it was not familiar to them as were the pastoral strains of Acis and Galatea. Miss Larkom sang the soprano music with marked intelligence and refinement, Miss Josephine Cravino gave an excellent rendering of the contralto part, her enunciation being especially good, and the recitations were declaimed with his accustomed power by Mr. Charles Fry. The second solo parts were taken by Miss Fetherstone and Master Young. The choruses were, on the whole, efficiently rendered, and the accompaniments were played by a small orchestra led by Mr. C. Gann.

DEVIZES.—The Inaugural Concert of the Amateur Choral Society was held on Monday, the 16th ult., at the Corn Exchange, Mr. H. Millington, of Trowbridge, Conductor. The programme consisted of selections from the sacred works of Handel. The orchestra was complete, the whole band and chorus numbering about 120 performers. The solos were given by Miss Annie Lee and Mr. D. Harrison, of Lichfield Cathedral.

DUNSTABLE.—On the 10th ult. Mr. Fred. Gostelow gave his fourth annual Concert in the Town Hall. He was assisted by Miss Minnie Kirton, Miss Osborn, Mrs. Cartwright, Mr. Puddephatt, and Mr. Heath; solo violin, Mr. Percy Elliott. Mr. Gostelow's choir boys delighted the audience with some capital songs and choruses.

ENNISKILLEN.—Mr. Arnold's fourth Matinée Musicale of Classical Music was given on the 13th ult., in the Protestant Hall. The programme included pieces by Hatton, Chopin, Gade, Beethoven, Mendelssohn, Weber, Mozart, and Nicolai, performed by Lieut. Dundas, and Messrs. C. and M. Arnold, and Mrs. and Miss Evans.

EPSOM.—On the 12th ult. Mr. James Hailes gave his second annual Concert at the Public Hall. The principal vocalists were Miss Meredith Elliott, Miss Ida Everard, Mr. T. W. Page, and Mr. James Hailes. A special feature of the Concert was the violin-playing of Mr. W. Frye Parker, whose two solos evoked enthusiastic applause. Mr. Hailes received an encore for an expressive rendering of Hatton's "To Anthea." The accompaniments were well played by Mrs. Hailes and Miss Kate Davis.

FROME.—An Organ Recital was given in Wesley Chapel, on the 19th ult., by Mr. W. Haydn Cox, of Bristol. The programme included pieces by Lemmens, Smart, Gounod, Wely, Handel, Lux, and Calkin. The vocalists were Mrs. G. S. Walker and Mr. H. Welham.

GROSVY, LINCOLNSHIRE.—The second annual Concert, given by Mr. Bennard, took place on the 2nd ult. The professional artists engaged were Miss Vinnie Beaumont, Miss Myfenwy Morris, and Mr. E. Dunkerton, who, with Mr. Bennard and Mr. Cleugh, made up a capital programme. Mr. C. W. Cray acted as accompanist.

LEEDS.—On Sunday, the 1st ult., Handel's Messiah was given in Salem Chapel, by the choir, largely augmented for the occasion. The choruses were rendered with much precision. The Organist was Mr. W. N. Hudson, and the soloists were Mrs. Dixon, Miss Ada Sutcliffe, Mr. G. M. Hinds, and Mr. John Browning. Mr. W. Toothill conducted.

LEICESTER.—The third popular Concert, second series, under the direction of Mr. J. A. Adcock, was given on Saturday, the 21st ult., in the Temperance Hall. Mr. Percy Whyte's Concert Company from Liverpool, and a full orchestra of 110 performers furnished the programme. Mr. Whyte's Company consists of Madame Laura Haworth, Miss Annie Hallwood, Mr. Whyte, Mr. George Platt, and Mr. Richard Holland, vocalists; Mr. Frank Weston, solo violoncello; and Mr. Franklin Haworth, pianoforte. Mr. Frank Weston (a native of Leicester) met with a very cordial reception.

LUTON.—Mr. Fred. Gostelow gave his first Concert in the Town Hall, on the 17th ult., before a large audience. The performers were Miss Winifred Parker, Miss Marie Hooten, Mr. Evan Jones, and Mr. Heath. Mr. Lathom and Mr. Steel gave some recitations, and Mr. Gostelow's choir of boys sang some songs and choruses. Mr. Percy Elliott (violin) and Mr. Gostelow (pianoforte) contributed solos.

MELBOURNE, DERBYSHIRE.—On Monday, the 23rd ult., the Orchestral Society gave its first Concert of the season. The principal items in the programme were the Overture to Der Freischütz (Weber); Symphony, No. 1 (Beethoven); Rigodon of Dardanus (Rameau); Coronation March, Le Prophète (Meyerbeer); the "Merry Christ Church bells" (Aldrich), arranged for orchestra; and the "Lost Chord" (Sullivan), cornet solo, Mr. Loake, and orchestra. The vocalists were Mrs. Hay-Gordon, who sang two songs, "The Maiden's Prayer" (Smart) and "Fiddle and I" (Goodeve), both with violin obligato by her husband; and Mr. F. T. MacDonnell, who contributed "Shall I in Mamre's fertile plain" (Handel) and "The two Grenadiers" (Schumann). Mr. Wilson conducted, as usual.

NELSON, NEAR BURNLEY.—A Concert was held on the 14th ult. in aid of the New Wesleyan Chapel. The principals were Miss Marjorie Eaton, Mr. Watson, and Mr. H. R. Whitaker. A quartet of strings was led by Mr. Titherington, and there was a chorus of forty voices. The programme was miscellaneous in character. Mr. Rycroft was the accompanist.

NEWCASTLE-UPON-TYNE.—Messrs. Traherne and Cecil were among the artists who sang at the People's Concert on the 14th ult. These gentlemen, though well known in London, were strangers to the musical public of Newcastle-upon-Tyne, who, however, will certainly accord them a very hearty welcome on the occasion of their next appearance. Two of their charmingly rendered unaccompanied duets, an original gipsy ballad, and a "Laughing Song," which gained for Mr. Ernest Cecil a spirited encore, and an old Irish love song, by Mr. Cecil Traherne, were all much appreciated by a large and enthusiastic audience.

NOTTINGHAM.—On Monday, the 23rd ult., the old Radford Church Choral Society gave a very pleasing miscellaneous Concert in St. Michael's Hall. The principal vocalists were Miss Maggie Jaques and Mr. Bingley Shaw, of Southwell. Solo violin, Miss Lizzie Mott. The Choral Society contributed part-songs, &c.

PETERBOROUGH.—A highly successful Concert was given in the Fitzwilliam Hall, on the 17th ult., in aid of the Building Fund of All Saints' Church. The principal vocalists were Viscountess Downe, Miss E. Palmer, the Misses Yates, Miss Magee, Mr. Taljanski, and Mr. Bailey. Miss Butcher was the pianist, and Mr. de Solla was accompanist and Conductor.

PULBOROUGH.—On the 3rd ult. a performance of the Sacred Cantata The Nativity was given in Pulborough Church, in addition to selections from the works of Handel, Gounod, and Stainer. There was a chorus of forty voices, whilst the following were the principals: Miss M. Osmond, Master J. R. Forder, Mrs. Seymour Kelly, Mr. Charles E. Pillow, Mr. Seymour Kelly, and the Rev. R. U. Beresford. The whole of the choruses were capitally performed, and showed that a great amount of time and labour must have been devoted to them by the Conductor, Mr. Seymour Kelly, who was ably assisted by the Rev. R. U. Beresford. Miss M. Cooke was the Organist.

RHYL.—The Philharmonic Society gave their annual performance of The Messiah on December 26, in the Town Hall, under the conductorship of Mr. Felix C. Watkins (St. Asaph). The principals were Miss Kate Fusselle, Miss Townshead, and Messrs. Fredericks and Harrison (Lichfield Cathedral).

RIFON.—On the 5th ult. The Messiah was performed by the Choral Society, in the Victoria Hall. The chorus was good, and the solos were sung by Miss Vinnie Beaumont, Miss Morris, Mr. Dunkerton, and Mr. Billington. The Conductor was Mr. Bentley. The band was led by Mr. Abdy Williams.

SITTINGBOURNE.—An evening Concert was given by the members of the Sittingbourne and District Musical Society, at the Town Hall, on Tuesday, the 10th ult. The larger portion of the evening was occupied by Handel's Serenata Acis and Galatea, the band and chorus numbering about eighty. The principal soloists were Miss Ada Beck, Mr. T. W. Page, and Mr. T. C. Holliday (Rochester Cathedral). Mr. W. Makepeace conducted. The second part was of a miscellaneous character.

SOUTHWELL.—A grand Concert was given, on the 11th ult., in the Concert Hall, in aid of the Literary Institute. The principal vocalists were Miss Maggie Jaques, Miss Fannie Lynn, Mr. Charles Blagbro, and Mr. Bingley Shaw. Solo violin, Miss H. J. Hutchinson; solo pianoforte, Miss Calvert; accompanist, Mr. Dawson. There was a crowded and fashionable audience, and the Concert was a great success, both musically and financially.

SPRINGHEAD (NEAR OLDHAM).—A Concert was given in Springhead School, on the 16th ult., by the singing class conducted by Mr. Thomas Birkenshaw. The sacred Cantata The Mother of Jesus formed the first part of the programme. The solos were taken by Miss A. H. Mercer, Miss Jennie Hall, Mr. G. H. Hedfield, and Mr. J. Butterworth. The second part of the programme was of a miscellaneous character. Mr. Robert Ashworth was the accompanist.

STOCKTON.—On Thursday, the 5th ult., a Sacred Concert was given in the North Terrace Wesleyan Chapel, in aid of the Circuit Funds. Mr. Barnby gave an Organ Recital; Miss Barnby, Miss M. A. Davis, Miss Rickinson, and Mr. Phillipson assisted. The choir sang several pieces, the chief of which were "Ave Maria," Barnby's "O be joyful," Sullivan's "The strain praise," Kinross's setting of Longfellow's "Psalm of Life," and at the close "Abide with me," to a new setting by the Organist. On the 17th ult. Mr. Barnby gave his second Concert for the season in the Exchange Hall. Miss Alice Whitacre, Madame Trebelli, Mr. Barrington Foote, Mr. Henry Piercy, M. Hollman (violoncello), and Signor Bisaccia (pianoforte) were the performers.

TENBURY.—The Musical Society gave the last Concert of its seventeenth season, on December 29, the principal item in the programme being Cowen's Sleeping Beauty. The choruses were given with great accuracy and spirit, a fact the more noteworthy as on this occasion they were unsupported by the customary band. The Conductor had arranged the orchestral parts for harmonium and piano in a very effective form. The solo parts were taken by past and present members of the Tenbury Musical Society. Miss Matthews sang the somewhat arduous music allotted to the Princess most admirably, and won the highest praise for this her first effort. The music of the Wicked Fay fell to Miss Josepha Miller, R.A.M., who possesses a beautiful contralto voice and charming style. In the other parts the Rev. A. H. S. Patrick and Mr. Amherst Morris, as usual, sang their best, and added not a little to the general success. The second part of the programme consisted of songs and choruses, including Smart's "Fay's Song," for ladies' voices, for which instrumental accompaniments had been written by the Rev. J. Hampton, who conducted the whole Concert with his customary care and ability.

WELLINGTON, N.Z.—Mr. Robert Parker gave his eighth annual Concert on November 14, when an excellent programme of classical music was very successfully given by an efficient orchestra and choir. The principal item was Beethoven's Pastoral Symphony (given for the first time in Wellington), which was well played and received with great enthusiasm by the audience. After its performance, Mr. Worgan, the oldest musician in New Zealand, spoke in terms of great appreciation of the performance, warmly congratulating Mr. Parker and the orchestra on their excellent work. It may be mentioned, as a matter of general interest, that Mr. Worgan (who was born in 1802) had heard the Symphony conducted by Sir George Smart, Spohr, Moscheles, and Mendelssohn. The other orchestral numbers of the Concert were Gade's Im Hochland, Schubert's Rosamunde, and Mendelssohn's Ruy Blas Overtures, all of which were admirably played; the orchestra, considering the remoteness of the colony, being of surprising excellence and completeness. Some madrigals and part-songs were sung with much taste, under the direction of Mr. C. Rous-Marten; and songs by Carissimi, Mozart, and Schubert completed a most successful Concert.

VERINI VIOLINS.

Price 5 Guineas each, may be had on approval from ALPHONSE CARY, Newbury (London Branch, 87, Oxford Street, W.) The following letter is but one specimen of a large number of unsolicited testimonials constantly being received.

53, London Road, Sevenoaks, Kent, January 12, 1888.

MR. ALPHONSE CARY,

DEAR SIR,—I am glad to be able to say that the VERINI violin, which I received on Tuesday last, gives me the greatest satisfaction. Since then I have played upon it a good deal, and candidly believe that it is the BEST NEW VIOLIN I ever tried, and equal, if not superior, to many old ones of considerable reputed value. The tone is very full and even throughout, and the purity and mellowness are surprising considering the newness of the instrument. With such a splendid tone already, I have no doubt the instrument will, with a few years' playing, be superior to many old violins sold at such high prices as to be quite beyond the means of many players.—Yours faithfully,
 W. M. ASHMORE.

THE CRUCIFIXION
A MEDITATION

ON THE

Sacred Passion of the Holy Redeemer

THE WORDS SELECTED AND WRITTEN BY THE

REV. W. J. SPARROW-SIMPSON, M.A.

J. STAINER.

This Work is an attempt to supply the want long felt of an easy and short form of Passion Music suitable for use in ordinary parish churches. It is composed for two solo voices, a Tenor and a Bass, and for the church choir. At intervals hymns occur, in which the whole congregation can join. The performance will probably not extend over forty minutes in duration, thus giving an opportunity for a suitable "address" if thought advisable. No orchestra is required, the accompaniments being specially adapted for the organ only; much of the expense usually attending Passion Services will therefore be avoided. The book of the words, for distribution among the congregation, will contain the music of the Hymns; by this means it is hoped that the congregation will be induced to take part heartily in the service.

PASSION SERVICE

FOR THE SEASON OF

LENT AND GOOD FRIDAY

BY

ALFRED R. GAUL,

Composer of the "HOLY CITY," "RUTH," &c.

"Scholarly writing, combined with unmistakable talent, and eminently adapted to the purpose for which it was written and composed, the work will probably be largely used, and Mr. Gaul have to be congratulated upon another success."—Sheffield Independent.

"The course of sacred events connected with the Passion is laid out by the writer so as to form a series of six distinct 'scenes.' The subjects of these divisions, each occupied with a particular stage of the Mystery, are, respectively: 'The Traitor at the Table,' 'The Denial,' 'The Condemnation before Pilate,' 'The Mockery on Calvary,' 'The Shadow of Death,' and 'The Holy Sepulchre.' The style of the composition resembles generally that of Mr. Gaul's previous writings—the same effective, grateful part-writing, and the same expressive and melodious treatment of the solo voice. In those sections, notably that of the Unjust Condemnation, where the realistic element is predominant, the composer has manifested his ability to write with dramatic force and intensity as well as with lyric charm. In this respect the choral writing distinguished itself in comparison with that in the 'Holy City,' and other of the composer's works. Mr. Gaul has not written new hymn tunes for the author's lyrics; the tunes selected are from among those in ordinary congregational use. Altogether considered, Mr. Gaul's new work will, undoubtedly, greatly enhance his already high reputation in the line of sacred composition."—Musical Standard.

AN ORATORIO COMPOSED BY

GEO. SHINN, Mus. Bac., CANTAB.

Price 2s. Cloth, 3s. 6d.; Sol-fa, 1s.

"Mr. Shinn is well known as the author of several Cantatas and other compositions, all of which are written in a style at once musically and popular. 'The Captives of Babylon' may be highly commended as an interesting and valuable addition to our shorter Oratorios and Cantatas. The work contains several solos of much beauty; also duets, quartets, and choruses in great variety. Choral Societies, which desire an interesting and moderately easy work to perform, will do well to select this Oratorio. It will well repay the time spent in its preparation, and will be sure to take."—Sunday School Chronicle.

"The music is appropriate, interesting, melodious, and but of moderate difficulty. The work is one of Mr. Shinn's best efforts, and we all know that Mr. Shinn has written some charming music. We heartily recommend this Oratorio to Choral Societies."—Essex County Chronicle.

"'The Captives of Babylon' will be found a welcome addition to the répertories of Choral Societies and Church Choirs."—The Musical World.

"The libretto is well chosen, and forms a good base whereon to compose a first-rate work. With regard to the music we feel we can hardly do it justice. Mr. Shinn's composition is a veritable picture, following the details of his subject minutely. Where all is so good it is difficult to mention any special numbers. We certainly advise our readers to hear the work and judge for themselves."—United Service Gazette.

"It is cleverly written, and in an attractive style. The music is of a varied and pleasing character, so that it is likely to become very popular."—The Portsmouth Evening Mail.

"An effective work."—Musical Opinion.

"Contains many very interesting numbers, and will doubtless be much appreciated by those in search of something new."—The Newcastle Daily Journal.

"Mr. Shinn is well known, and deservedly so for his musical talent. Continuity of design and freshness of conception are apparent throughout the work. It contains many effective solos and choruses, and the music is not difficult. There is no doubt that the Oratorio will become very popular."—South London Press.

JOAN OF ARC

FREDERICK ENOCH

ALFRED R. GAUL.

"Must enhance the high reputation of its composer. From beginning to end 'Joan of Arc' is marked by perfect and natural melody, a smoothness that is really delightful, and instrumentation that indicates the touch of a master hand. . . . Adds one more to the illustrations of the composer's musical skill and tact."—Liverpool Courier.

"The music from beginning to end is of the highest order, both in form, construction, dramatic expression, and religious colouring. Particularly beautiful is the great wealth of melody, which carries with it the impression that it is the outcome of the inspiration and genius of a highly-refined musician. . . . The Cantata is even a more masterly and beautiful work than 'The Holy City.' . . . 'Joan of Arc' is one of the most melodious, refined, and expressive works that has come under our notice."—Huddersfield Examiner.

"It is a matter of congratulation that Mr. A. R. Gaul's work should have been selected for representation this year. No more charming Cantata than 'Joan of Arc' could have been chosen. It abounds in delicious music. There is not a tedious note in it, nor any number which can be accused of impairing the dignity of a composition having a lofty aim."—Newcastle-on-Tyne Daily Chronicle.

"The purpose of the music of 'Joan of Arc' is thoroughly evident throughout the work, and the many descriptive passages are admirably suited to the composer's intentions, and give the listener a vivid and realistic impression, its attractiveness being continuous instead of spasmodic."—Bradford Observer.

"The Cantata possesses many interesting features and admirable qualities. The choruses are always effectively written—the solos are extremely melodious; in fact, this is a distinct characteristic of the entire work, which will doubtless recommend it strongly to choral societies desirous of pleasing the public. On the whole, the Cantata is a healthy work of a conscientious musician, which deserves, and will probably achieve, great popularity."—Newcastle-on-Tyne Daily Journal.

"There is a reality about the whole tone of the work that seems to bring every scene in the life of the French heroine vividly before us."—Border Counties Herald.

"The subject is a fascinating one, and dramatic enough to serve for an opera. The construction of the text (by Mr. Frederick Enoch) is more in favour of the musician than librettos generally are. 'Joan of Arc' is a useful work, its abundance of melody and comparative easiness will commend it to the numerous choral societies throughout the country."—Newcastle-on-Tyne Daily Leader.

"It would not be surprising if it attained to even the almost phenomenal popularity of 'The Holy City'; for, although its subject is so different, it is laid down very much upon the same lines, and contains a similar wealth of melody and effective part-writing."—Birmingham Daily Times.

"Reading the score convinces us that it is our townsman's greatest production. The music displays more skilful workmanship than any music we have received from the same hands. . . . Could have been originated by none but a born melodist."—Birmingham Daily Gazette.

"A distinct advance upon Mr. Gaul's previous work in cantata form. . . . A constant flow of exquisite melodies and effective choral writing."—Birmingham Daily Post.

"Now with matured experience and ripened scholarship he gives to the town which has received and welcomed his first triumphs his magnum opus, 'Joan of Arc.'"—Birmingham Daily Mail.

"The Cantata, from the first bar to the last, is rich in melody, beautiful harmonic combinations, and clever orchestration. The beautiful 'Ave Maria' is a splendid example of pure and fervent church music, but there are so many exquisite points of merit in Mr. Gaul's latest work that they hardly need detailing. Taking the work as a whole, it bids fair to become a great favourite with all choral societies."—Birmingham Weekly Post.

"A thoroughly melodious work, and should find favour with choral societies. It is not difficult to sing, and contains sufficient variety to keep up the interest to the end."—Manchester Guardian.

RUTH

ALFRED R. GAUL.

"The work, like the 'Holy City,' is full of beautiful orchestral passages, while the vocal score abounds with charming numbers."—Bucks Herald.

"'Ruth' is a work of sterling power; its musical form is that of perfect tunefulness combined with simplicity and strength. . . . The composer has grasped his theme in a thoroughly sympathetic manner, and has produced a work which is worthy of the subject."—Bradford Observer.

"Bright, tuneful, fresh, and musicianly—this work will be a great favourite, and will add to Mr. Gaul's reputation."—Birmingham Weekly Dart.

"'Ruth' has been set to music by several composers; none, however, has become so worthily popular as the Cantata under notice. . . . It contains some charming music, and is highly characteristic of the story it so vividly illustrates."—South Wilts Express.

"Full of flowing melody."—Salisbury Times.

THE BRIDAL DAY

Dedicated by permission to Professor Sir GEORGE MACFARREN, M.A., Mus. Doc.

Written by FREDERICK B. NEEDHAM.

COMPOSED BY LEONARD BARNES.

MUSICAL TIMES.—The music is characterised by an easy flow of melody, and is expressive and musicianly. The work may be recommended to the notice of singing-classes.

MUSICAL WORLD.—The Overture and Opening Chorus are conceived, like many other passages, in the spirit of Sullivan, and it must be owned they would not disgrace the stage of the Savoy. It may be safely predicted that the work will attain considerable success.

THE BAZAAR.—The plot offers much scope for dramatic passion, and the Composer has shown that he knows how to take advantage of his opportunity in every case. We can cordially recommend this work to choral societies.

WEEKLY DISPATCH.—This is just the kind of work for choral societies.

THE QUEEN.—Much graceful music is included in this Cantata.

THE GRAPHIC.—This easy and tuneful work will please at a choral concert.

PREFACE.

These Antiphons are designed to occupy a position in Church Music midway between the Anthem and the Hymn Tune, and base their claim to acceptance on the ground that they offer to Cathedral Choirs some more or less well-known Hymns, treated in the Anthem form to which they are accustomed, and to Parochial Church Choirs and Congregations a development of the Hymn Tune without any serious increase of difficulty. They also follow more closely than a Hymn Tune could possibly do the varying emotions which occasionally find expression in the same Hymn. And further they accommodate themselves to the irregularity of accent which occurs in some of our best Hymns, and which the inflexible rhythm of the Hymn Tune only serves to emphasize.

Although in Cathedral and other highly-trained Choirs these Antiphons may be treated as Solo, Quartet, or Chorus at the discretion of the Choirmaster, yet it should be understood that they have been written mainly with a view to their being sung in unison by a whole congregation. That this should be done effectively it is necessary that the congregation should be provided with the music, if only to warn them where interludes occur and words are repeated for the sake of greater emphasis.—JOSEPH BARNBY.

* The Antiphons marked (*) are published. Others in the Press.

ORGANISTS AND ORGAN STUDENTS. AINSWORTH'S PATENT ACTIONS & ORGAN PEDALS

May be easily attached to any Piano, Harmonium, or Organ, and they afford perfectly unique Pedal Practice. Having put down at my Works two Engines and Machinery of the most desirable kind, I am now supplying my goods to the Trade and Profession at actually lower prices than that charged for the Old Roller Action and its modifications. You are kindly requested to have one of AINSWORTH'S Illustrated Lists by you. On receipt of trade or professional card you will receive Lists and liberal terms. All AINSWORTH'S Actions from Class C upwards are fitted with Modifying Stop, whereby the whole compass of pedal notes are modified (pp, p, f, ff) at will, although the performer pedal *exact*ly the same.

My DEAR SIR,—I have much pleasure in informing you that your Pedals have given the fullest satisfaction. I have them combined with my practice Piano. Many of my musical friends who have seen them, as well as my organ pupils, are quite delighted with them; and I must acknowledge that I have never met with any Pedals so noiseless and pleasant to play upon as yours. The Action I consider durable, and of very good workmanship. Every organist who desires to perfect his playing will welcome your invention. I can recommend your goods in every respect.

To JOHN AINSWORTH, Esq.

CAUTION.—The unparalleled success of AINSWORTH'S Patent Actions has caused unscrupulous persons to offer for sale various modifications of the old Roller Action.

THE MADRIGAL SOCIETY offers TWO PRIZES, being the "Molineux Prize" of Ten Pounds with the Medal, and the "Society's Prize" of Five Pounds, for the best and second best APPROVED MADRIGALS in not less than four nor more than six parts, the upper part or parts to be for one or two treble voices. The character of the composition to be in accordance with that of Madrigals of the best style and form, with imitative part writing; not a mere part-song or harmonised melody.

The following conditions must be complied with, viz.:

1. That the Alto and Tenor parts be written in their respective clefs.
2. That the signature be repeated at the head of each page at least;
3. That the intended Tempo be clearly indicated; and
4. That the words be written out in full on a fly leaf at the beginning.

The Madrigals to be delivered, addressed to the Secretary of the Madrigal Society, Woodside, Caterham, Surrey, on or before October 1, 1888, each composition having a device or motto affixed thereto, with the composer's name in a sealed envelope bearing a corresponding mark.

The award of the judges will be made known at the meeting of the Society in December, 1888.

THE MUSICAL TIMES

AND SINGING-CLASS CIRCULAR.

MARCH 1, 1888.

THE ROYAL ACADEMY OF MUSIC.

It may be accepted as a fact somewhat significant of the attitude of the public towards the Royal Academy of Music, that the interest taken by the outside world in the election of a Principal—the highest position to which a musician can aspire in this country—has been keener than upon any former occasion since the Academy has been in existence. It seemed as though it were felt that music was on its trial in the country, and the appointment of one to follow Sir George Macfarren would determine not only the spirit but the nature of the work to be done. The character of his successor would unquestionably influence the conduct of future affairs. Certain it is that all who were interested in music watched the result of the deliberations of the committee with some attention, if not anxiety. All doubts were most satisfactorily set at rest when the choice was declared. It is the first time in the history of the Academy that anything like a contest has attended the election. The succession has been previously determined within the walls of the Academy without delay or question. The present circumstances were somewhat peculiar and embarrassing. On the death of the late Principal there were none of the Professors ready or willing to accept the responsibilities of the office, and as the work could not be allowed to stand still, a provisional committee, consisting of Messrs. Walter Macfarren, Sainton, and Steggall, was appointed. It was obvious that this state of things could not be of long continuance.

Mr. Walter Macfarren himself was named as a candidate for the office. If he had persisted in his candidature he might at this moment have occupied the position now held by Dr. Mackenzie. But he, in conjunction with the majority of those who have devoted their best efforts and a long period of their lives to the advance of the concerns of the Academy, rightly felt that those matters could be best promoted by the transfusion of new and healthy blood into the body.

The arrangements concerning the ruling of the affairs of the Academy are somewhat special. There is a President, Vice-Presidents, and a Board of Directors, who are armed chiefly with moral power. There is also another board, the committee of management, in whom is vested the actual ruling and control of the affairs of the Institution. The directors, after due deliberation and careful consideration, recommended the committee of management to proceed with the election of a Principal at the earliest possible occasion. The day was fixed, and the relative merits of the several candidates doubtless gravely and deliberately discussed. At first several names were mentioned, but those whose qualifications entitled them to respectful consideration were Mr. Frederic Hymen Cowen, Mr. Joseph Barnby, and Dr. Alexander Campbell Mackenzie. Mr. Cowen withdrew his name, having in the meanwhile accepted a very lucrative and honourable offer from Melbourne to conduct a series of Concerts à propos of the centenary of the foundation of the colony. The contest therefore rested between Mr. Joseph Barnby and Dr. Mackenzie. Mr. Joseph Barnby expressed himself willing to sacrifice his position as Precentor of Eton College, whence it is said that he derives a large income, in order to devote himself to the work of the Academy, where the emoluments are equal to only £500. This self-sacrifice was very properly applauded by his supporters, and was admitted on all sides as a proof of disinterestedness. His musical qualifications were, however, worthy of mention. He was a pupil of the Academy, and he was proxime accessit to Arthur Sullivan in the contest for the first Mendelssohn Scholarship. He is the author of a large number of chants, hymn tunes, services, and anthems, and finding his best mode of expression in those forms and for that use, he has limited his efforts, and as yet has only given to the world two orchestral works, or rather, two works in which the orchestra is employed as an adjunct—namely, his Sacred Idyl or Cantata “Rebekah,” to words by Arthur Matthison, and a bold and vigorous setting of the Psalm “The Lord is King,” produced at the Leeds Festival of 1883. His chief claim to distinction rests in his power as a choir trainer and director, and in this respect he deservedly holds high rank. Those who have watched his career may be disappointed at its want of fruitfulness, for excellent as are his many qualifications, the musical world would have been better pleased to have had other works in addition to those of the style which has helped to make his name popular. The points which have been strongly urged in his favour, his power of organisation and his great capacity for business, tended largely to help his candidature. His connection with the Academy, as Conductor of the Students’ Concerts, brought his best qualities to the front, and justified his supporters in considering him the right man to rule over a musical institution whose proceedings were watched with the greatest interest by all who have the cause of musical progress at heart.

The contest was doubtless keen enough and close enough to make even defeat honourable, while the gratification which attends success must be tempered by due recognition of the responsibilities attached to the office. The knowledge that for a time, at least, they will be carried on under the keenly critical eyes of former opponents and of interested friends, will render the exercise of the utmost circumspection needful in the conduct of all the affairs of the Institution as far as the new Principal is concerned.

There is no need to fear for the result. Dr. Mackenzie is a tried man. He was a loyal and assiduous pupil. He not only gained honour during his course of pupilage in the Academy, but was selected by the then Principal, Mr. Charles Lucas, as the recipient of a special testimonial after his battle with the world had begun. An exemplary student often makes an exemplary ruler. He who has learned to obey has learned also how to govern. His long and honourable career as a musician in his native city (Edinburgh) is still quoted as a pattern for emulation. The late John Hullah, no mean judge of character, and one who sought by all means in his power to bring about the recognition of genius wherever he found it, repeatedly referred in his official reports to the Education Department, to Mackenzie’s work in connection with the Training College of the Church of Scotland in Edinburgh. Privately he was wont to express his admiration for his powers both musical and executive. “Mackenzie combines in himself the rarest of opposing qualities. He is not only an earnest, excellent, and conscientious musician, but he also is endowed with thorough business capacities.” This testimony comes with powerful appropriateness at the present moment. It is in a measure a prophetic support of those who have sustained Mackenzie in the struggle now happily over. John Hullah’s view was apparently taken by that section of the committee of management who were able by their hearty support to secure his election.

Cheered by the consolations of those "opposing qualities" which appealed so strongly to the mind of John Hullah, Dr. Mackenzie would doubtless have regarded his defeat, had it occurred, with equanimity. Sustained by them he will be enabled so to direct the affairs of the Institution as to make it still more worthy of the respect and admiration which has hitherto surrounded its name both at home and abroad. The lustre of his accomplishments, his wide-minded sympathies with music and musicians, whatever be their forms or modes of expression; his practical knowledge of how the work of teaching should be approached and carried on, the geniality of his disposition, and his consummate tact and judgment, all combine to make his appointment not only hopeful for the prosperity of the Academy, but also for the development of music in general throughout the length and breadth of the land.

WAGNER AND LISZT IN THEIR LETTERS TO EACH OTHER.

THE recent publication, by Messrs. Breitkopf and Härtel, of two goodly volumes, containing an interchange of a long series of letters* which passed between Wagner and Liszt during 1841-61, must have been as welcome to many as it was unexpected, seeing that it had been heralded by no preliminary blowing of trumpets, as might very justifiably have been done in an undertaking of such exceptional interest to the musical world of the present day. Wagner and Liszt!—Who, that has derived pleasure from listening to the musical works of one or both of these two great giants of the post-Beethovenian period, whether or not he has plodded through their voluminous literary writings and much that has been written about them, will not burn to know what they had to say to each other?

How often, on reading the letters of one eminent man to another, one has longed to know what the reply would be! How seldom has this wish been gratified! One recalls the letters of Goethe and Schiller as a notable exception; and here, happily, we have another, and one which to many will be of equal interest. For these letters of Wagner's and Liszt's are arranged in chronological order, and thus to a great extent one comes in reply to another, and thus, in reading them, a certain sense of continuity is maintained almost throughout.

The disappointment which many must have felt on first opening these volumes, that there is not a word on the title-page indicating by whom they have been edited, nor even a prefatorial note explaining how their publication has been brought about, has fortunately been removed by a declaration on the part of Wagner's widow, made through her spokesman, Herr Richard Pohl, that she alone is responsible for the task. She states that it was soon after the laying of the first stone of the Bayreuth Theatre (1872) that her father, Liszt, made her a present of this collection of her husband's letters, together with the original scores of the "Holländer," "Tannhäuser," and "Lohengrin," and the manuscript of "Jesus of Nazareth"; adding that she was to regard them as her own inalienable property, but that she had full liberty to do what she pleased with them. Prompted by the feeling that these letters, which she has so lovingly treasured up, should no longer be withheld from the world, she has now published them, but with the assurance that there are no others to follow, no others having been preserved. Welcome as they are, it is to be regretted that the identity of many of the personages therein alluded to is concealed by their names not being given in full. Sometimes the initial letter of a Christian name suffices, and sometimes a still less conjecturable X. Though this plan was probably dictated by regard for the feelings of some who are still living, it is much to be wished that, when a second edition is issued, it will be accompanied by explanatory foot-notes, which would serve as a sort of running commentary on the text. This, we are glad to learn, is already in contemplation.

The two volumes before us contain 366 letters. Allowing for some half-dozen which bear the signature of the Princess Wittgenstein, nearly two-thirds of them in number emanate from Wagner; but if we also take their extent into consideration, it will be found that Wagner is to be credited with a still greater proportion. They cover an important and coincident epoch in the lives of the two masters—viz., that of Wagner's exile from Germany after the revolution at Dresden, in 1849, and that of Liszt's residence at Weimar, which terminated in 1861, the same year that Wagner was permitted to return to Germany. From this date it may be surmised that there was less call for so constant a course of intercommunication. Wagner was now reinstated in Germany (as Kapellmeister to the King of Bavaria), and fully able to stand on his own legs again. Liszt, on his removal to Rome, was less able than heretofore to help his friend. At this point in their altered circumstances the correspondence is brought to a somewhat abrupt but suitable conclusion.

In his autobiographical sketch of the earlier part of his career (up to 1842), Wagner has drawn a most mournful picture of his first stay in Paris, where, while hoping against hope for the production of his "Rienzi," and in order to keep body and soul together, he was driven to undertake such hack-work as writing articles for Schlesinger's Gazette Musicale and making arrangements of the popular operas of the day for the pianoforte and other instruments, including even the cornet-à-pistons. The picture which might be drawn of the earlier part of his exile at Zürich from a perusal of his letters pales before this. Fleeing from Dresden, where he left a sick wife behind him, he soon found himself in an absolutely penniless condition, and with no immediate opportunity of obtaining even such hack-work as he had formerly managed to subsist on in Paris. To whom then should he turn for help but to Liszt?—Liszt, who had already befriended him, and who now ungrudgingly not only supplied him with the necessities of life as far as he was able from his own pocket, but also enlisted the sympathies of others in his behalf.

There is no lack of evidence of Liszt's noble-mindedness and generosity in the sketches of his life which from time to time have been put forth. One looks back to the Beethoven Festival at Bonn, in 1845, of which he was the prime mover, when he not only put down one-fifth of the cost of the monument to be erected to the memory of the great master, but also made himself responsible for the whole expense of the inaugurative musical festival which accompanied the unveiling of the statue, including the cost of the erection of the building in which the musical performances were held. One has heard repeatedly of his munificent gifts to his countrymen when they had suffered from an inundation or a conflagration; one has heard of his liberal donations to the poor in places where he has given Concerts, and of his unbounded kindness to pupils, from whom he would take no fee. But all this is as nothing in comparison to what he did for Richard Wagner. The first to recognise Wagner's extraordinary ability as a composer, he at once determined to do all in his power to assist him in the furtherance of his claims, and to this determination he was led, not by any personal regard for Wagner (for it was not till a later period that he came to know him intimately and to love him), but by the strong desire he entertained of seeing a revolution brought about in musical art progress, especially in its relation to opera. With his usual but extraordinary prescience, he at once saw that Wagner was the only man of the day to achieve this, and though helping him in his schemes could not but react detrimentally upon his own immediate fame as a composer, he nevertheless made up his mind to it. What other instance is there of a composer exalting a rival composer at his own expense? Can one imagine anything more high-minded, more noble, than such a self-sacrifice? It is gratifying to find that Wagner fully recognised this self-sacrifice on Liszt's part.

What Liszt did publicly for Wagner—in the way of bringing his works to a hearing and writing the most masterly and appreciative critiques upon them—is a matter of history and open to all to read, but what he privately effected for Wagner during his exile in Switzerland, at least as to matters of detail, has now for the first time been made apparent in the letters before us. During this period Liszt supplied him regularly and liberally with money, wrote him most friendly and encouraging letters, gave him the best advice as to the course he should take in many matters of the highest importance to him, was ever ready to execute his commissions, from the smallest to the greatest, and acted as his intermediary, not only with publishers and theatrical managers, but also with the crowned heads of Germany, in view of bringing about his return to his Fatherland, which he ultimately accomplished.

To return to the period of Wagner's exile. On fleeing from Dresden he paid a flying visit to Liszt at Weimar and then proceeded to Zürich. Thence he soon went to Paris, but finding it impossible to establish himself there, and being strongly opposed to the idea of de-nationalising himself, he returned to Zürich. His life here, after having tasted the sweets of success at Dresden, where he filled the post of Kapellmeister to the King of Saxony, and where "Rienzi," "Der fliegende Holländer," and "Tannhäuser" had been produced, must have been doubly bitter to him. Here at first there was no opportunity of making a living, and he must have longed even for the Paris "pot-boilers" of his early time. But notwithstanding his impecuniosity, and though often driven to the verge of despair, he managed to get through an immense amount of work, which at first, with a view to keeping himself in contact with the outer world, was more literary than musical. By degrees the occasional direction of a concert or music-festival, and the conductorship of the Zürich Theatre, together with the small tantième arising from performing rights of his operas in Germany, brought some slight improvement to his circumstances. But as his means increased so did his wants. When he was at length well forward with the composition of the "Nibelungen" he stood in need of a copyist, for whom, as he says, he had work enough for three years, and whose salary had to be paid. The fear of immediate poverty was constantly the great obstacle to continuous working, which could only bear fruit in the far distant future. "If I only had an assured income, then I could get on with my work!" This was the constant burden of his song, and strenuous were the attempts which he made through Liszt to obtain it for him from the grand dukes or other influential persons in Germany. But there were other obstacles to steady work in the way of actual composition, which could only be got rid of under certain conditions. All great geniuses have their peculiarities. Wagner required sunshine. We find him abusing the long continued gloom of winter and longing for the return of spring, in order that he might set to work on the music of "Siegfried," the poem of which he had completed. Two other conditions seemed absolutely necessary to him—work at high pressure and under the greatest state of excitement, or perfect rest.

On this latter account, and for his health's sake, which was often none of the best, frequent excursions among the Swiss mountains were often undertaken. By no means the least important of his excursions from Zürich was that which he made to London in 1855 as Conductor of the Philharmonic Society. But of this more anon. Though he made Zürich his head quarters during the greater period of his exile, it at last became intolerable to him from the fact that, while engaged on the composition of the "Nibelungen," and with "Tristan" seething in his brain, he could not find a house in which he could live undisturbed by the sound of somebody else's piano, without buying a piece of ground and building a house for himself. Thus at a later date we find him at Mornex, near the Lake of Geneva, where he found solitude and perfect quiet, but a wretched piano, and where, by the by, his only relaxation from his own work was reading through the scores of some of Liszt's "Symphonische Dichtungen," which he says he did in exactly the same way as he would a volume of poetry, deriving the greatest pleasure and satisfaction from them, but longing for Liszt to be there to play them to him. Subsequently we find him at Lucerne, and eventually at Venice, his favourite resort, and which he regarded as the quietest city in the world on account of the absence of vehicular traffic, which was always a source of the greatest disturbance to him. It was here that he put the finishing touches to "Tristan." Finally we find him in Paris, where Liszt had advised him to take up his abode, but where, after the disastrous performance of "Tannhäuser" in 1860, he did not long remain, permission having now been accorded him to return to Germany.

Some reference is now due to the letters themselves. In almost every instance it is Wagner who takes the initiative and Liszt the subordinate position of kindly and graciously replying. "Ask and ye shall have" would generally serve as a motto for Wagner's letters; "it is more blessed to give than to receive" for those of Liszt. The first six letters, extending over the period 1841-8, and to which no reply is here vouchsafed, are all Wagner's. The first dates from the year following his first meeting with Liszt in Paris, in 1840, an account of which, by Wagner himself, was given in full in THE MUSICAL TIMES of October last. It is apparent, therefore, that their friendship was one of very gradual growth, for it was not till after Wagner's flight from Dresden, in 1849, that their correspondence became "fast and furious." But the "fast and furious" part of it was all on Wagner's part, for those of his letters which have not the ulterior object of asking for money or some other favour are quite exceptional. Liszt always replies in terms of the utmost friendliness, but in a dignified manner. More than once he has to remind Wagner that he has a mother and three children in Paris who are dependent upon him for support, but promises to do the best he can for him. Many of Wagner's letters, which often amount to the dignity of essays, are of extreme interest, both from a musical and a literary point of view. Even at the present day conductors and singers might learn much from the minute and lucid directions he gives for a proper performance of "Tannhäuser," "Lohengrin," &c.

As examples of his literary power, one frequently comes upon the germs of much that he subsequently elaborated in his theoretical writings. His letter detailing a change of plan in the composition of the "Nibelungen," and in which he first discloses the idea he had gradually come to, that the subject of "Siegfried" could not be compressed within a single drama, but must be extended into three, with an introductory drama, is one of special interest. So too is that in which he discourses upon Schopenhauer's philosophy, on first making acquaintance with it. As coming nearer to home, a series of letters written from London in 1855, when he held the post of Conductor of the Philharmonic Society's concerts, will be greedily seized upon by English readers of the present day. We learn therefrom that he undertook the engagement more from the hope of its leading to his bringing out "Tannhäuser" and "Lohengrin" in London during the following year than for the salary offered—viz., £200 for the season of four months, and which he regarded as little enough. Life in London he describes as "a hell upon earth," for, with scarcely any other friends than M. Sainton, Ferd. Praeger, and C. Klindworth, he found himself in a totally false position. Concert-conducting, he soon discovered, should not be allowed to interfere with his work as a composer. Though he got on well enough with the band and the public, and was warmly complimented by the Queen and the Prince Consort, the general opposition of the press was a bitter pill to him.

To Liszt, as being "the only man who understood him," Wagner was always in the habit of sending his scores as soon as they were completed, with the request for something of Liszt's in return—a request which Liszt was not slow to grant. What the two friends had to say about each other's works amounts to little more than mutual admiration. One occasion, however, of Liszt's venturing to criticise a work of Wagner's is too important to be lightly passed over. On receiving the first version of his "Faust" Overture, written in Paris in 1840, Liszt, after duly praising it in the main, remarks that it would be improved by greater importance being given to the second subject, which, in common with many a critic of a later date, he takes to represent Gretchen. Wagner retorts that he is quite mistaken. The Overture was intended for the first movement of a "Faust" Symphony. Its proper title, therefore, would be "Faust alone, his longings, his despair, and execrable condition." Gretchen, who was to be the subject of the second movement of the Symphony, had not yet appeared upon the scene. On re-writing the Overture at Zürich, in 1855, Wagner to some extent follows Liszt's advice, and not only gives greater weight to the second subject, but also finds a motto for it, which will doubtless figure in future programme notices of the work.

Some of Liszt's letters are given in the original French, of which language he was a perfect master, as well as in a German translation. It is satisfactory to be able to state that Wagner's diction in his letters is of a less involved style, and therefore more easily comprehensible, and pleasanter reading than is usually the case with his theoretical writings. As an English translation, with the preparation of which Dr. Hueffer is said to have been entrusted, is imminent, another opportunity of reverting to these letters will present itself at no distant period. We may therefore well defer speaking more fully of them at present.

MATERIAL OF MUSIC.

III.

In dealing with the combinations which are employed in music there are many facts which are interesting and many that are curious. In each case their curiosity and interest do not wholly require a special aptitude for understanding them. The knowledge which may be derived from a rapid survey does not involve any abstruse preparation to discover those parts which are instructive and useful.

There is no doubt but that the earliest musical compositions were chiefly melodic. It was not until long after the practice of music had attained a recognised position in the world of art that men sought to extend its resources by the aid of science.

It would be difficult now to decide how harmony or the accompaniment of melody by appropriate chord combinations arose. Whether the scientists of far distant ages suggested the use of particular sounds in combination, according to the order arising from the natural harmonics of an open string or pipe, or whether the union of melodies in pleasant combination was an accidental discovery made by singers or performers, cannot be ascertained. The probabilities are in favour of the latter proposition. In all other branches of knowledge it is known that empirical practice preceded scientific understanding, that effects were known to follow certain causes long before the reasons which contributed to the results were reduced to explanation. It is therefore not unlikely that harmony was produced, and became common in practice, ages in advance of the discoveries of the mathematicians concerning music.

It is quite certain that harmonic combinations are employed in music which have hitherto baffled all attempts to account for them satisfactorily on scientific principles. It has been asserted that there is no true minor third generated by the harmonics of an open string or pipe. The existence of so many melodies in the minor mode, and the possibility of successfully harmonising them so that the sense of minor tonality is never lost, has on the side of the musician been urged as a claim to the recognition of the minor scale. One of the few known melodies of the ancient Greeks, that set to the first Pythian ode of Pindar, probably by the poet himself, is in the minor mode, and this may be advanced as proof of the antiquity of the scale sufficiently remote in its origin to satisfy the most exacting. Whether it was harmonised by the musicians of those far away days in the manner which we should call minor, is impossible to decide conclusively in the present day. The probability is against the use of such a mode. We cannot tell with certainty either how the musical instruments were tuned. The construction of the cithara (κίθαρς), or harp (φόρμιγς), admitted of accompaniments in chords, and it is difficult to believe that with the means under the hand, as it were, that chords were not played. There is no positive information on the subject, but the word which is used to describe combinations of notes bears a striking evidence of the possibility of its having been derived from the chords or strings of the lute or harp.

The actual employment of sounds in consonance may have been made in times of the highest antiquity for all that we know, but our knowledge of the origin of harmony, as now in use, dates from a period long subsequent to the establishment of the Christian era.

The introduction of organs into use for the service of the Church, about the seventh century, was the first step towards the invention of harmony. These organs, which were of primitive construction, were at first used to accompany in unison the plain-song of the Church. The keys were wide, the mechanism troublesome. The organist was compelled to guard his hands from injury while performing, and because he had literally to strike the keys he was called pulsator organorum, a term which was repeated in describing him as an officer in Cathedral Statutes as recently as the beginning of the eighteenth century.

It is supposed that by accident he made two notes sound consonantly, and the effect thus produced was imitated by the singers, and gradually improved upon and extended. The practice of singing after this manner was called ars organandi or diaphonia. It was originally in two parts and the added notes were given as a concluding cadence. Hucbald (840-932), whose ladder enabled musicians to reach the heights of musical notation, also improved the art "which they commonly call organisation," and formulated a series of rules for its construction. His organising was in fourths, fifths, or octaves. Two thirds were not allowed to succeed each other, but were to be as carefully avoided as are consecutive fifths and octaves in the present day. The reason for this rule may be found in the fact that these ancient writers, up to a century later than Hucbald, and including Guido d'Arezzo (990-1070), founded their precepts of harmony on the principles of the Pythagorean system which made all the thirds too sharp. Fifths and octaves were more comfortable to the sensibilities than a succession of such thirds could possibly be, though such a form of "perfect" harmony would in time become absolutely appalling. There is no reason to believe that the senses of the musicians or of the men of those days were obedient to a different organisation to our own, or that their nature was not prone to as great a delight as we experience in the successions of harmonious chords in these degenerate days.

It is reasonable to believe that this crude Diaphony or Organising was encouraged to give sonority to the plain-song. It was probably sung by a few voices against the greater body of those who chanted the plain-song, so that the effect was like that of the mixture stop in an organ. That the minds of men longed for a more perfect exposition of pleasing principles is proved by the constant efforts to improve the practice of harmony. The first steps in advance were made when the theories derived from the Greek were discarded, and the tempered scale, which had been in use for generations among the "Lewid folk," who loved music, was recognised and pressed into new service. Beginning with Franco of Cologne, and Walter Odington, a monk of Evesham in the thirteenth century, and followed by Philip de Vitriaco, Bishop of Meaux, the reputed inventor of the minim, who died in the fourteenth century (c. 1360), and John de Muris, his contemporary, who first reduced the rules of descant, as known in his time, to a clear definition, the art made slow but recognisable progress towards perfection.

The use of the sixth in harmony, hitherto ignored or forbidden, was recognised, and the practice of falso-bordone was instituted. Organum and diaphony were superseded by the employment of effects which were exceedingly pleasing, but which, because they could not be accounted for by the established tests, were called "false burden," or harmony. One of the earliest writers, who gives rules and examples of this new, pleasant, but "false" practice, was Johannes Tinctoris (1434-1520), who also compiled in Latin the first known Dictionary of Music.

There were worthy musicians centuries before who had put these matters to a practical use, as witness the existence of the canon with a burden "Sumer is a cumín in," written about 1250, and the masterly compositions of Willen Dufay, born just one hundred years later. Ockenheim, or Ockeghem, Obrecht, Josquin des Pres, and other composers of the fifteenth century made successive additions to the stores of harmony, until, in the sixteenth century, the art of harmony was expanded and its exercise carried on to a successful issue such as commands the admiration of musicians even in the present sceptical times. From the great missionary centre of the fourteenth century (the Low Countries) was sent forth a number of enthusiastic men of genius, under whose direction schools of music were founded in Spain, Italy, France, Germany, and, to a certain degree, in England.

These old Flemish worthies preached a new crusade—that of musical art; and by the same process which gave life and vigour to the nations ready to receive their instruction, they so drained the artistic resources of their own country that musical vigour was spent, and a long period of weakness succeeded the abnormal strength which it once possessed. The genius of the several nations modified the material so imported, and caused it to assume different forms of varied beauty and character.

Spain, which had supplied the form of poetry and the name of the madrigal, seems to have been content with this amount of contribution towards one of the most characteristic examples of secular music which was the outcome of the new life. She produced very few composers of more than average merit, though she had done much towards forwarding the progress of music in a negative way.

France took a more active fancy to the work, according to the spirit of the nation. The country had enjoyed the advantages of the teachings of a school of music which had given birth to the scholar who returned with large interest the endowments of former generations. In Italy the soil was better prepared for the reception of the good seed, and it brought forth fruit in abundance of quality and beauty that attracted all nations to share in the harvest.

The motett and the madrigal were brought to the greatest perfection by the composers of Italy, and Spain and France were left behind in their endeavours in this direction. They had entered upon the race, but they were outstripped by their younger and more vigorous opponent. The exuberance of the fancy of the French composers prompted them to take the melodies of the old popular songs, many of them derived from the motets of the Troubadours, and not always associated with respectable words; as the themes upon which to exhibit their skill in the employment of the ingenuities of the new system of counterpoint. The talent which was displayed awakened the emulation of the Italian writers, and so an abuse sprang up which required the strong action of the Church to repress. It was one thing to sing or play these melodies in the streets, or to chant their words at the tavern benches set in chambers as unwholesome as the words; but it was an outrage upon decency to make these tunes minister to the ritual of a service at which all unholy thoughts should be banished.

No wonder that we find right-minded rulers turning their thoughts seriously to the question of reform, long before the time when the Council of Trent debated the necessity of discontinuing all music in the Church, because of the abuses of it which had crept in. No wonder that we find "Neque motetos, neque uppaturam vel aliquem cantum magis ad lasciviam quam devotionem provocantem, aliquis decantare habeat, sub poena gravioris culpæ," when it is known to what wicked ends men had turned their talents to in the treatment of the motett. In the present day the name is applied to a different sort of composition to that for which it gained its title.

Happily for the art of music there were some of the dignitaries attending the Council of Trent who knew its value as an aid to devotion, and who prevailed in their endeavours to obtain a respite, and not a banishment for the beautiful art, which had been made subservient to base ends.

Their foresight was justified by the issue. The employment of the purer forms of expression, and simpler means, brought the minds of the people back to a more fitting state, and music, divested of meretricious associations, became again a power for good. For a long period vocal music alone occupied the attention of those interested in the practice of music. The madrigal, which took a firm hold upon the affections of the lovers of music, was the central sun round which lesser secular compositions moved. The charms of polyphonic harmony were studied and enjoyed through the various examples of its forms supplied by the musicians of the period. It derived its name from the poetry to which it was originally set. This was a kind of proverbial witty saying cast in an epigrammatic mould. The well-known "Quando ritrovo la mia pastorella," called in English "Down in a flowery vale," offers a familiar example of the typical character of madrigalian verse.

There are hundreds of madrigals extant, the earliest specimens of which contain evidences of the character claimed for it in the definition implied in this verse. As this primitive Italian madrigal by Contanzo Festa (1490-1545) is also regarded as one of the earliest specimens in a settled form, it may be accepted as typical of the style.

Before the Italians found the name of madrigal for this class of composition, the old Flemish masters had settled the musical form in their chansons. Josquin des Pres (1445-1521) and others founded the school in which the Italians laboured side by side with Flemish representatives and carried their works to so good a result.

There are three important periods in the history of the madrigal. The first, which began with the chansons of the Netherlandish composers in the fifteenth century; the second, represented by the Italian writers; and the third, in which the English composers Birde, Gibbons, Morley, Weelkes, Wilbye, and others produced those imperishable monuments of their genius for the wonder of posterity. Each period was overlapped by the peculiarities of its precursor, and the efforts of the English musicians were the crowning points of a design based on a broad foundation.

The musical instruments of those days were of a rudimentary character and, to a great extent, all incapable of what we should now consider as artistic employment. What they were, and how they were developed, will form the subject of later reference. It must therefore be sufficient to say that the improvements in the construction of the members of the viol family and in the mechanism of the virginals, gave an impetus to the study and practice of and upon musical instruments which had scarcely been imparted at any time before in the whole history of music.

Those who had already qualified themselves to sing their part in a madrigal probably preferred the instrument which was the nearest representative of their own voices. Madrigals were arranged to meet this new accomplishment, in the "Madrigali di Stromenti," the instrumental parts were the duplication of the voice parts. There were also madrigals for instruments alone, but these are rare, inasmuch as it did not fail to strike the composers that the title given to a musical piece without the words which marked the character, was somewhat of an incongruity. They were therefore called "Fantasias" or "Fancies." There is reason to believe that these "Fancies" were first composed for stringed instruments, and afterwards for the virginals. The stringed instruments were, in the seventeenth century, made in sets so constructed as to fit into a box, which was called a "Chest of Viols"; the largest of the set was somewhat smaller than the violoncello in present use. They were usually six in number—namely, two trebles, two tenors, and two basses. The treble viols were also called discant viols, a name which is preserved in Germany to the present day, where the first violin of an orchestra is called discant-geige. From the treble violin being held to the shoulder, it was also called Schulter-geige, in German; Violon dépaule, in French. In England the tenor viol was called the Mean, because it was midway in size between the treble and the bass. In Germany it was called Arm-geige from the manner in which it was held, or named Bratsche, from the Italian Viola de Braccia, which means the same thing. The bass viol was called in Italian Viola da Gamba (leg viol), in German, Knie-geige, from the position in which it was sustained.

They were all furnished with frets or small ridges of catgut or metal, fastened at stated distances on the finger, to enable the players to stop the notes correctly. They were therefore known as "division viols," in contradistinction to the instruments made by the famous Italian and Black Forest artists, which were often without frets. The fiddle or violin makers were called in France luthiers, because they combined the manufacture of lutes with viols.

The lute was an instrument of the guitar type furnished with five or six pairs of strings, tuned in unisons or in octaves. A chest of viols, with a lute or a pair of virginals, as a single instrument was called, some flutes, recorders, shawms, and bassoons, or an organ, formed the constitution of a band or orchestra in the sixteenth and early part of the seventeenth centuries.

Besides the stringed instruments already alluded to, there were certain wind instruments known at the time when the madrigal had attained its highest perfection. There were flutes, recorders, shawms, serpents, and bassoons, each in groups and played together, or sometimes in association with one another. The flutes and recorders were open pipes with mouthpieces, the shawms and bassoons were played with a reed in the mouthpiece, and produced the nasal tone of acid quality familiar to those who have heard the modern hautboy. The serpent was an open tube with a mouthpiece, in the performance upon which the lips formed a temporary reed.

A band of flutes, treble, tenor, and bass, was occasionally employed as a military band; brass instruments, so called, were not invented. The trumpet and sackbut, or trombone, were made of tin or copper. In France, to this day, brass instruments are called tin (d'étain), and in Germany copper (Kupfer).

A group of shawm players was called "the waits," and their instruments were also distinguished by the same title. Each town of importance supported or encouraged "the waits," and among the household servants of the nobility and princes such persons were among the permanent retainers. It was part of the duty of "town minstrels," as they were sometimes called, to accompany the watch in their perambulations at stated periods of the year, and from this practice arose the custom observed by itinerant musicians of performing in the streets in the quiet hours of the night about the time of Christmas, the name of "the waits" being given to these people, though they do not perform upon the instruments so called.

By JOSEPH BENNETT.

No. XXIV.—HÉROLD (continued from page 81).

LAST MONTH we left Hérod elated by the success of his collaboration with Boieldieu in "Charles de France." He was thus affected with good reason.

The resultant advantages were many, not the least of them being the readiness of dramatists to confide their works to a man with whom Boieldieu did not disdain to associate on intimate artistic terms. Even the most popular librettist of the time came to Hérold with a work, and the composer, knowing the value of Théaulon as a co-labourer, at once accepted "Les Rosières," which was destined for the Opéra Comique. Another work, "Corinne au Capitole," also occupied his attention. This excited his sympathy in a special degree, because founded upon the famous romance of Madame de Staël, whose books he admired beyond measure. There was some mystery about "Corinne." Hérold professed not to know who had influenced the Grand Opéra to commission it; he does not even mention in his journal the name of the librettist, and the work was never produced. Mr. Jouvin goes so far as to speak of "ninety-nine certainties against one probability that it was never written." On the other hand, "Les Rosières" came to a hearing, being played at the Théâtre Feydeau on January 17, 1817. This opera was well received by the public, but failed to please the critics, who found that the music to some extent violated the traditions connected with pieces for the Feydeau. Jouvin's own opinion about it is thus expressed:—"In 'Les Rosières' Hérold is not yet quite master of himself. It declares his inspiration, no doubt, but here and there with the inflections of Mozart or Méhul." Nevertheless, the opera kept the stage, and was played forty-four times in the year of its production. It was revived in 1826, and again in 1860, the total representations being 114. Some time before "Les Rosières" was produced Hérold amused himself with confiding to his journal a prophecy concerning it. He wrote: "Prediction about 'Les Rosières,' this 16th of August, 1816. If we put this work on the stage, it will be much hissed at the first representation, but much more applauded, at the second it will be found amusing and be hissed to the end, at the third they will hiss it more than at the second, but the success of the piece will make them fly into a passion. The other performances, numerous ones, will be profitable, and the piece will run a long time." The spectacle of Hérold trying to familiarise himself with hisses in advance, and succeeding with a bad grace, has been likened to a child who, playing at courage, blows out the candle in order to see ghosts and lights it again for fear the spectres should gratify his wish.

Eight months after the production of "Les Rosières," Hérold had another work ready, an opéra-féerie called "Clochette," founded on the story of Aladdin, whose lamp was represented by a magic hand-bell, and the Genie by a "diable page." This piece was brought out on October 18, 1817, and achieved a brilliant success, partly due, however, to the splendour of the spectacle. "The real beauties of the score," remarks a contributor to La Revue Musicale, "were not appreciated as much as the stage show"; some reasons for which fact are stated by the pianist Chaulieu, a friend of the composer:—

"People found Hérold denationalised. Amateurs did not recognise their ordinary style, and preferred to gratify their accustomed habits. It must be said that Hérold, rightly considering that the interest of the scene should rank before all, greatly neglected to accommodate the virtuosi of the drawing-room, and concerned himself in his pieces with the development of the dramatic situation, heedless of everything else. Later on he found out his mistake—one which compromised his interests by preventing him from selling his works at the figure obtained by his rivals—and he resigned himself to make some concessions to public taste." In this case the critics were wiser than the public. They praised "La Clochette" with warmth and saluted the young composer as an ornament of the French school. The work was performed seventy times—an enormous run for those days—but it has not been played since 1827. Its production derived a touching interest from the fact that Hérold's master, Méhul, died on the same night. As the performance went on special messengers brought to the moribund composer's bed-side reports as to the success achieved, and when there could be no doubt that his pupil had triumphed, Méhul fell back upon his pillow murmuring, "I can die now; I leave to France a musician."

After the success of "La Clochette" Hérold rested a while from operatic work, owing, it is thought, to the difficulty of obtaining a good libretto; but he was not idle. In point of fact, he turned his attention to the writing of pianoforte pieces, chiefly of a light character. But even with these he did not show the commercial mind, and it is again the pianist Chaulieu who laments the fact. The prevailing mode at that time was a square-cut form and fiery Finale, to be played almost with strokes of the fist. Hérold, following his own preferences, wrote quiet and elegant music that demanded style and finish in performance. In this he offended, and amateurs disdained his works, all but some variations on the air "Au clair de lune," which became very popular.

As no good libretto came to hand, Hérold accepted an adaptation of a comedy, "Le Premier Venu," brought out at the Odéon seventeen years before. The transcription was made by the author, Vial, and a Mr. de Planard. This was fore-doomed to failure, because, as every man knows who gives the matter a moment's thought, the features, such as elaborate ingenuity of plot, which are merits in a comedy are defects in an opera, where all should be simple and broad. Nevertheless, the work was played at the Feydeau, September 21, 1818, where it obtained no more than a success of esteem, even that being due to a few charming musical numbers, which Jouvin likens to flowers few and far between, blooming amid an Arctic waste. But this did not turn the composer from attempting to rekindle extinct fires. He next set music to a one-act operetta, "Les Troquers," written by Vadé in 1753 and composed by Dauvergne, who, concealing his identity, wrote in imitation of Pergolesi, in order to profit by the combative partisanship of one of the sections into which the musical world of Paris was at that time divided. On February 18, 1819, Hérold submitted the old piece, as retouched by no fewer than three literary co-labourers, together with its new music, to the judgment of the public, who applauded the composer and hissed the librettists. This was for Hérold, happily says a French biographer, "to be immolated, crowned with flowers, like a pagan hostage." If the public would not have the libretto, the music must needs go with it, just as one of the Siamese twins had, perforce, to accompany the other. So "Les Troquers" ended in vanity and vexation of spirit.

Our composer's next effort was made upon a new book, the work of an unknown poet named Auguste Rousseau. It proved even a greater failure than the preceding. The music to the piece contained very charming things, and won hearty applause at the general rehearsal. So far, Hérold was gratified; on the other hand, he saw that the libretto had made an unfavourable impression. Under these too familiar circumstances, he took a bold step, and withdrew the piece. "L'Amour Platonique" was, therefore, never performed, and all the master's work upon it went for nothing. Undaunted by continued and undeserved misfortune, Hérold made another venture, this time accepting a piece—"L'Auteur mort et vivant"—from his old associate, Mr. de Planard. A more unfortunate choice could hardly have been ventured. The book was clever enough, but its cleverness consisted in keen satire and cutting epigrams, which, however effective in a comedy with a purpose, are out of place in an opera. They were above the heads of the general public, and only succeeded in irritating many of those who understood them. "L'Auteur mort et vivant" had a run of forty nights, and was then withdrawn, never again to be produced. Referring to these repeated checks, Hérold's friend Chaulieu writes:—"Shall I describe all that Hérold suffered during those four mortal years; or how, tormented by the desire to produce, and the impossibility of achieving his wish, he felt all the glory of his future expending itself in the small change of cold and languishing works? No; the remembrance is too painful. How many times, in our solitary walks, he lamented lost time and forced inaction! Disgust mastered him, and made itself felt even in his pianoforte music, which, with the exception of two or three works, was a species of current money to which he attached no value. It was, however, at that time that he wrote his Fantasia on themes by Rossini, which had a great sale, and at which he was the first to laugh. The spirit of youth still sustained him; he was gay and vivacious in private, but in public morose and caustic."

A natural reflection with reference to Hérold's repeated failures through bad books is that the composer should have been more careful in choosing from the works submitted to him. Here was a man not without experience in operatic matters, surrounded by people capable of advising him, and in close touch with the public for whom he laboured, yet four successive times he made a mistake. This, be it observed, is no isolated case. Similar instances are numberless, and the observer is almost tempted to conclude that composers are constitutionally incapable of distinguishing a good libretto from a bad one. We do not go so far as that, but the question is worthy of thought whether their absorption in a fascinating art does not stand in the way of the general culture and comprehensive perceptiveness necessary as the basis of a sound judgment in the matter referred to.

Although Hérold is said to have kept up his spirits, four failures naturally had their effect upon him. He accepted the post of accompanist at the Théâtre Italien, and for a time abandoned composition as far as the lyric stage was concerned, limiting himself to pieces for the pianoforte.

In 1821 Hérold was sent into Italy by the Intendant of the Royal theatres, charged with the delicate task of hearing the principal artists there and engaging a certain number for the Italien. Full particulars of this mission were confided to his journal, and Jouvin gives several extracts, which, as they concern other people more than Hérold, need not be reproduced here. Enough that, after a good deal of negotiation, Hérold succeeded in engaging Madame Pasta, who became "the glory of the Théâtre Italien under the Restoration"; he also secured Galli, and, in the course of a detour through Germany, when returning, added Pisaroni to his list. At Munich he made his first acquaintance with Meyerbeer's music—in the opera, "Emma di Resburgo"—and wrote: "M. Meyerbeer is certainly not without talent. In his 'Emma' there are a trio, a finale, a chorus, and a grand duet, all remarkable. The airs in which he follows the (Rossinian) taste of the day are worthless. His music is not very singable, but original, well made, and nervous." On reaching Paris, Hérold was warmly congratulated as to his success in making good engagements, but his manager proved rather slow in settling the account. However, as the negotiator naïvely confided to his diary, he had made some profit by his various labours and put enough money in the national funds to secure a yearly income of 1,800 francs. This soon grew to 2,000 francs, for our composer, like John Gilpin's wife, had a frugal mind. He is represented by Jouvin as alternately "lifted up by the poetry of art and dragged back by the prose of existence." "The artist," says the same writer, "his face beaming, dreamed of beautiful operas he would write, while the man, his hand on his account book, carried his savings to the Treasury."

We now find Hérold upon matrimonial thoughts intent, and that in a very undecided vacillating manner. Consequent upon this he lost his first love. Another suitor appeared upon the scene, who knew his own mind, and was accepted. "He is the first who has asked me in marriage," said the damsel, "and I shall marry him." Our composer next fell in love with a girl of sixteen. This time he spoke out and was accepted; but immediately took alarm at his own act. "What have I done?" he cried, "an enormous folly!" Hastily he wrote to the parents of the girl, representing, amongst other things, that he, at thirty, was too old for a maiden of fifteen-and-a-half, and begging to be released. The young lady's family, not unnaturally displeased, consented to what they termed postponement, but Hérold was not particular as to the word so long as he obtained acquittance. While seeking a bride, and running away from her when found, Hérold did not neglect his art. He took once more to composition for the stage, and produced (May 12, 1823) an opera called "Le Muletier," the libretto by no less famous a man than Paul de Kock. In his journal Hérold wrote à propos: "Let us talk a little about my 'Muletier.' Hissed a little the first evening, it is now all right. The journals have unanimously praised me, and I cannot find the woman I want." The marks of disapprobation, we are told, were caused by the excessive length of the book, but they took little or nothing from a genuine success. Fétis points out that the music of "Le Muletier" is well coloured, dramatic, full of happy features and novel effects. These qualities asserted themselves against all opposition and established the opera in the good graces of the public. Four months later, Hérold appeared at the Academy of Music (Grand Opéra) with a one-act piece, "Lasthénie," founded on an episode in Lantier's "Voyages d'Anténar en Grèce." The librettist, De Chailou, remained anonymous, which was well for him, because the public, who had outlived the classic rage, made merry with his Grecian story and French dialogue. Hérold wrote in his journal: "'Lasthénie' has been badly enough received by the public. Trivial utterances in it made the spectators laugh." The second performance was more fortunate, happy changes in the poem securing the favour of the same public. We are now at the sixth representation, and the house is always full."

Hérold's next venture was a pièce de circonstance, "Vendôme en Espagne." Readers of European history know the circumstances under which the French Government of 1823—a Government of Bourbons—interfered in the affairs of Spain, for dynastic reasons. The Duke of Angoulême commanded the army, and after a short period of absence returned to Paris in the capacity of a military hero (pinchbeck). It was to celebrate this event that Hérold and Auber set music to "Vendôme en Espagne," and that the piece was performed (December 5, 1823), at the Grand Opéra, before the royal family. The genius of the two composers, it has been said, was but a pretext for official enthusiasm, and the opera obtained applause from a crowd who did not listen to it. Hérold's journal contains rather full details regarding this event, amongst them the master's impression of the scene: "Chosen by the Government, with Auber, to write the music to 'Vendôme en Espagne,' grand opera, on the occasion of the return of the Duke of Angoulême, we worked, Auber and I, for two months like mad. 'Vendôme' was given on Friday, December 5, before a magnificent assembly: the King, Monsieur, Monseigneur, and Madame la Duchesse d'Angoulême, &c., all the Court. A box, splendidly decorated, had been constructed in the amphitheatre. An expressible enthusiasm, blue ribbons and red ribbons in the the parterre, complete success—these were the results of the evening. Some days later, presented to the Minister of the Maison du Roi, the marshal Marquis de Tauriston, we received from his mouth the assurance that our work had given pleasure to the royal family."

"Vendôme en Espagne" was repeated at the Tuileries on December 16, and at the close of the performance the King commanded that the authors should be presented to him. "We ranged ourselves," writes Hérold, "in the salon through which his Majesty would pass. The royal box opened, and the Duke of Angoulême came out, preceded and followed by some officials. He rapidly saluted us. Monsieur followed: same ceremonial. Princes do not stop when they precede the King. The King appeared, seated in his wheeled chair. His Majesty said to those who propelled the vehicle, 'Stop!' Not being heard, he cried louder, 'Stop, stop!' That time he was obeyed. We drew near. The chief usher announced 'The authors of 'Vendôme,' and his Majesty said, very graciously, 'It is a very beautiful spectacle. It is charming. I am entirely satisfied.' Then the King departed, the Duchesses of Angoulême and Berry followed and saluted us, as the Princes had done."

... A singular thing! I never remember being so sad as on that evening, which closed so honourably for me. A presentation to the King, a court costume, and yet an involuntary preoccupation. And while I was not moved at the moment when the King passed, it seemed to me that my three co-labourers, Empis, Ménéchet, and Auber, were much agitated. To-day I have read in all the journals a description of last night's scene, and am very pleased." Hérold's satisfaction was enhanced, no doubt, when the King sent him a diamond pin. With regard to the foregoing circumstances, Jouvin says, and we entirely agree with him:—"Here were honours, compliments, ceremonial, without reckoning presents, for a musical whitewash (badigeonnage) which deserved to last just as long as the painted and decorated triumphal arches erected in the Place de la Concorde on fête days. Princes believe that they greatly honour the arts when they bestow the commonplace of their smiles upon these gilded masquerades of poetry and music which pass before them without being looked at, or heard, and which humiliate the poet and musician. And what is still more sad, the artists thus recompensed, have the humility to savour such rewards with all pleasure and pride. It was on the two memorable evenings of 'La Muette' and 'Zampa' that Hérold and Auber deserved to see the doors of the Tuileries open before their renown, and to be treated as kings by the King. Will they never learn to act with propriety in France?"

Perhaps it was through basking in the sun of Royalty that, at this time, Hérold gave way to the social ambition of a fine house and a carriage. In his journal we read: "I have committed an act of folly perhaps—perhaps an act of wise provision for the future. I have bought a house in the Rue de Berry, No. 4, for the sum of 96,000 francs, not reckoning the costs, which will mount up, through various charges, to 10,000 francs. Behold me, then, with 110,000 francs to pay, and 60,000 are all I have to do it with. To that I have a ready answer—nine years ago I possessed nothing. Ah! well, yes:—a house, a garden, a stable, a coach-house, &c., &c. And the carriage!—the carriage for which I have bought a house! the carriage for which I live so far away! the carriage for which I have so economised. Ah, well! I have it at last. A pretty mare, age beyond calculation, the harness and the vehicle, stood me in 1,200 francs. But I have many things for which to pay, and every day there is a new purchase. Thou hast willed it, Ferdinand Hérold!" The composer soon found that a fine house and all the rest of it do not ensure happiness. In point of fact, he wearied of his unwonted splendour, and confided to his diary the exclamation: "Ah! if I could let my house!" Again he wrote:—"I have read, I think in Madame de Staël, that one is never six months in the same situation. It is, however, nearly a year that I have been waiting upon a house that I cannot let." Yet once more he wrote: "At this moment I am ill—sick of ambition, a chimerical ambition, a nothing. But that nothing, another obtains it, and I believe that I deserve it as much as he, though not for the same reasons. The balance should be just. Second malady: A new piece of mine is coming out in three days, and I am afraid of it. Will the 'Lapin Blanc' be strong enough to capture the heads—of cabbages? I fear, and I hope. Third malady: My mortgages. Fourth malady: Mdlle. C. Pouf! I do not sleep at night. I see the day dawn and the sun rise without having closed an eye. And nothing, nothing makes amends. I must acknowledge that matters have gone wrong with me for a year past. Rents increase, and my house remains empty. Philosophy becomes a necessity. I console myself at times in thinking of a long journey, which shall make me forget all that annoys my feelings. But for my mother I would go away, no matter where." Jouvin's comment upon this passage is that it shows the eternal struggle of dreams against reality in the composer's spirit. "Sometimes victory declared for the ideal, sometimes for the actual. In this man, who passed from a work of music to a ledger, and mixed up the one with the other, the stamped paper of his deeds and scrip with the ruled paper of his scores, it seems that one sees a poet leaning in an attitude upon the ledgers of a book-keeper." This is, perhaps, a little too strong. Hérold simply wanted to make money and enjoy it, and his financial achievements proved, once more, how necessary it is that musical composers should be treated like canaries—be comfortably housed, well looked after, and relieved from all mundane cares."

The "Lapin Blanc," about the fate of which Hérold had doubts, was produced at the Opéra Comique, May 25, 1825, and failed so completely that he is said to have marked the date in his journal with a black cross. The audience were really angry, and the curtain fell amid a storm of hisses, which the composer thought undeserved. "A subject," he wrote, "which I found charming, treated with esprit by a man of talent; music, perhaps the least heavy and bad of all the works I have composed." Yet on the "fatal day" the piece was hooted from the first scene to the announcement that the authors desired to preserve their anonymity, while on the morrow one journal declared that the music "was too feeble to obtain pardon for the words," and another protested that the music was "the entire mistake of a man of talent who has been praised too much, and whose next work will be good if nobody conceals from him the weakness of this." Here was a prophecy destined to come true, for Hérold's next work was "Marie."

CENTENNIAL MUSIC IN AUSTRALIA.

It is satisfactory to find that our brethren at the antipodes have not forgotten the claims of music to a place in the rejoicings over the hundredth anniversary of their national life. Were they to ignore those claims they might almost be forgiven. So young a community, properly absorbed in the work of building up a group of states and laying the foundations of material prosperity, is tempted to pay small heed to what may at present be regarded as superfluities, or refinements out of place. But the Australians, in their youthful vigour, are equal to more than the most pressing demands. They combine art with industry, and while subduing the land pay attention to the culture of themselves. At Sydney, therefore, music entered fully into the ceremonial rejoicings, and it is refreshing to read in the public prints how the importance of this matter was insisted upon beforehand. In one journal we find an almost impassioned appeal, distinctly worth reproducing here:—

“Surely, then, the citizens of Sydney, whether individually they be musically disposed or not—surely the citizens of this premier capital of the Southern Seas will not allow an occasion so unique as the centennial birthday of Greater Britain to pass by without that fitting and majestic celebration which nothing in the whole wide world can give like Music. Shall it be said that we Australians, as we are represented by the citizens of Sydney who must in all such local matters become the mouthpiece and the active agent of the colony, if not the continent, at large—shall it be said in older lands that we are so poor in spirit or in pocket, or in both, that we cannot or will not give the celebration of our Centenary that especial character which most becomes it? Shall we be twitted by our fellow-Australians in the sister colonies, by our brethren at home, by our trans-Pacific cousins, and by our friends in Europe generally, that we are so madly addicted to the saddle, scull, and cricket-bat, that we have neither care nor fancy for the lyre? No! emphatically, no! Let those who feel, and feel rightly, that muscular stamina, physical endurance, and honourable rivalry form the foundation upon which the strength of all great nations must be built, give to the celebration that character of manly sport on which Australia justly and legitimately prides herself. But, at the same time, let those who believe that ‘Man is not fed by bread alone’ seize this one grand occasion to let the whole world know that our glorious country, in entering upon the second century of her existence, not only realises the influence and importance of the arts, but is able to make use of them in a fitting manner when the proper occasion for such use arises.”

With the right note thus sounded full and true, we cannot doubt that the centennial musical doings at Sydney, though, it appears, somewhat hurriedly prepared, were worthy of the occasion, and befitted the importance of an art which can be carried in one or other of its many forms and with all its refining influences to the most lonely settlement or the most distant sheep run.

But if we want to discover more than is at present known in England with regard to music in Australia, attention must be fixed upon the proceedings, actual and prospective, at Melbourne, in connection with the forthcoming Exhibition. Melbourne already enjoys repute as a musical city, and, we believe, possesses considerable executive resources, vocal and instrumental. We are not surprised, therefore, at finding that the Government, supported by public opinion, has determined to make concerts a conspicuous feature in the programme of the great show. Performances, it appears, are to be given daily while the Exhibition remains open, and it is intended to produce a large number of orchestral and choral works in a manner not only worthy of the music chosen, but becoming to the community's cultured and artistic taste. It was hardly to be expected, perhaps, that the Colony would contemplate doing this with its own proper means. No doubt there are many capable Australian conductors, singers, and instrumentalists, but these would not for a moment claim to rank with picked men of the old country, rich in experience and knowledge, as well as up to a higher standard of skill. Hence the authorities have done well to supplement native resources by talent drawn from this side of the world. They wanted before all things a good chef d'orchestre—a man of standing and repute, whose name carries weight and whose co-operation is an assurance of success. We hear in well-informed quarters that Mr. Henschel was asked to fill the post of Conductor, but, although that gifted musician has thrown in his lot with ourselves, it may be said of him that

In spite of all temptations
To belong to other nations,
He remains a Teuton man.

Other things equal, the position at Melbourne should be filled by an Englishman, and it is pleasant to know that the agent of the Colonial Government could not have had much difficulty in finding the person wanted. We name no names, but it is obvious that any one of half-a-dozen English musicians might have been chosen with reasonable assurance of a satisfactory result. The lot, our readers know, has fallen upon Mr. Frederic H. Cowen, and towards the end of May the composer of “Ruth” and the “Scandinavian” Symphony will leave our shores for his distant post.

It is an obvious duty to congratulate Melbourne and the Colony upon the choice that has been made. In Mr. Cowen they have an artist and a gentleman whom they may be proud to see at the head of their Exhibition music, and, no less, to welcome in their social circles. They have, moreover, a Conductor whose rank as such may be estimated by the fact that he has succeeded Sir Arthur Sullivan in the possession of the Philharmonic Society's bâton, and whose knowledge of classical and modern works, combined with excellent judgment, will secure fitting programmes and adequate performances, as far as that depends upon an orchestral chief. There can be no doubt that Mr. Cowen in Melbourne will be a success—first, for the Exhibition; secondly, for himself; last, but not least, for the cause of music in the Colony. The presence of a musician so distinguished, and the daily performance of an orchestra the principal members of which are, we believe, to be picked from the best of our English instrumentalists, cannot fail to give the cause of art an immense impetus. This result is in the very nature of things, while it may be that the present engagement of a prominent musician from the old country will lead to others of the same kind, and so bring the music of the Colony into closer association with that of the mother land. But for present satisfaction we need not speculate about the future. Enough that Mr. Cowen, in undertaking the post offered him by Melbourne, guarantees that which England is honoured in supplying, and the Colony benefited in receiving.

ONE of the troubles of the “Concert-noticer,” sometimes called the Musical Critic, arises from the want in the English tongue of synonyms for certain stock expressions. Thus, when he has written the word "performed," he is compelled to fall back upon "executed," then "played," then "gave," then "rendered," and then he—like some of the items he describes—is "done." In his anxiety for variety he adopts terms that seem to be serviceable without enquiring into their applicability or to their philological accuracy. For example, the word "rendition," so frequently employed to express performance, like the word "execution," is of a somewhat ambiguous meaning. Each word is capable of a double signification, for "execution" may be the "doing of something to death" in fulfilment of a just sentence, while "rendition," if it means anything at all, can only be interpreted as the action of "tearing to pieces," or of giving in after a defeat. How far these words are fitted to express the action of a musical performance is doubtful. The poverty of our native tongue evidently exercises the minds of those versatile gentlemen attached to country newspapers who are "turned on" to do the music, a fire, a coroner's inquest, or a parish meeting. They have "a nice derangement of epitaphs" suitable for each case, a choice assortment of fine words, which would be as beautiful as they are impressive if they were only inserted in the right places. When we find a rural genius gravely informing his readers that "the dominant key is A major in Mendelssohn's 'Italian-Symphony,'" some regret is felt that no information is offered about the Tonic. When, further, we learn that "the melody is taken by the cellos and basses, and, flowing over and around the orchestra with an exquisitely beautiful effect, is brought to a conclusion most impressively by three chords 'pizzicato' on the double bass," and "one's fancy can picture a rustic dance with the adjuncts of soft scenery, a brilliant moon, and an Italian sky, as the different measures trip from section to section in the orchestra," in this "most jubilant of symphonies," we feel that much is being done in quiet quarters to raise musical criticism into the ranks of the finer arts. The genius who declared that a certain singer was not successful "from a vocalistic point of view," and the clever creature who praised the performance of Rossini's Overture "See my remedy," will not have to wait long for their reward.

ARE we really to conclude from the course of the Coutts-Lindsay and Hallé-Carr controversy that the art of painting is degraded by association in the same room with the art of music? Messrs. Hallé and Carr—of Mr. Hallé better judgment might have been expected—appear always to have entertained a notion that the Grosvenor Gallery was desecrated by concerts, as well as by evening parties and the vicinity of refreshment rooms. On the other hand, Sir Coutts-Lindsay seemed to be of a different opinion. Perhaps, however, no opinion was involved. Many men agree to procedure about which, because not flagrantly improper, they do not trouble to think. But, be this as it may, Sir Coutts let his gallery to concert-givers and was not ashamed. The revolt of Messrs. Hallé and Carr may have caused him to turn the matter over in his mind. We can fancy him cogitating long and deeply upon the question whether the execution of one of Beethoven's Rasoumowsky quartets insults one of Mr. Burne Jones's pictures of angular and distressful women. The issue is a serious matter, because proving—the Grosvenor Gallery being now closed to concerts—that Sir Coutts has been constrained to agree with his former lieutenants even against his own pecuniary interests. Where does the degradation of painting by music come in? Musicians are rather disposed to think that, if a distinction must be made, the truth lies the other way about, and that painting, in all that constitutes true artistic qualities, cannot compare with music. But we have no desire to discuss precedence. Our purpose is only to protest against the ridiculous arrogance which claims that the representation on canvas of some natural, or unnatural, person or scene must not be approached by a masterpiece of music. The pretension is too absurd for argument; but, all the same, it is extremely characteristic of a certain school of painters, whence come the sensationalists and poseurs of the profession.

THE affair of Josef Hofmann in America is not one to be regarded with entire equanimity. There are three parties to the circumstances which have led, so it is stated, to the boy's temporary withdrawal from public life: First, the ladies and gentlemen who have raised money to secure that object; second, the parents of the child, who, it seems, have accepted a large amount; third, Mr. Abbey, to whom young Hofmann was engaged. The American sympathisers with the poor little fellow deserve only praise. They saw, or fancied they saw, a valuable young life being undermined, perhaps destroyed, and they put their hands in their pockets to save it at the cost, we are told, of 100,000 dollars. As for the parents, no particular sympathy is deserved by them. They appear to have treated the matter as simply a question of money, and, in effect, to have said: "We will spare the boy for so much; if you do not give us so much he shall go on working." Mr. Abbey also takes a business view of the matter, but with more excuse. He has his contract, and demands that it shall be fulfilled or damages paid. Meanwhile, how about the little lad himself? If reports be true, Josef feels that he cannot go on working, and there was a touch of infinite pathos in his remarks to an interviewer of the New York press:—"It is too much for a little boy like me. I don't want to play any more, and if Mr. Abbey comes, tell him I am dead." All this might have been foreseen by anybody who knows the conditions of public life in America—the constant excitement and strain, the absence of privacy in which the harassed nerves can have rest, the distances to be got over, and the entire, but, of course, not intentionally cruel, disregard of all prudential consideration for the object of a fashionable "craze." Our concern now is that the gifted child may be preserved from overwork, and may leave the too-stimulating atmosphere of the concert-room for the healthy influences proper to his years.

OPERATIC prospects in London, as far as next season is concerned, are now of a definite nature and we know what may be expected. Their most singular feature is negative—that is to say, the absence from the field of three managers who, for some time, have occupied it. Mr. Mapleson has a remarkable facility of springing up again when circumstances lay him low, and there is no telling what such an old managerial hand may do. But, at the present moment, it seems very unlikely that anything will be heard of Mr. Mapleson in his directorial capacity. Mr. Lago also suspends, or ceases, operations, the scene of his exploits being that on which Mr. Harris proposes to figure; while Mr. Carl Rosa keeps out of London altogether. Mr. Harris thus has a fair field for his campaign at Covent Garden, the only thing to be conquered by him being the good will and support of the public. His season will last only eight weeks, during which time thirty-two performances will be given, the répertoire, we understand, being mainly that of the Drury Lane season last year. It is possible, however, that the manager will bring out one new work. What that is nobody knows, since the question of producing one at all has not been positively settled. Verdi's "Otello" is, we understand, not in the running, consequent upon the unwillingness of the publishers to sanction its performance under the conditions proposed by Mr. Harris. This we regret, but in any case the opera-loving public may depend upon a series of fine and effective representations of favourite works.

A CIRCULAR has been sent out by order of the Society of Science, Letters, and Art of London, Kensington, inviting professional musicians at home and abroad to send in their names, addresses, qualifications, &c., for insertion in the "Official Directory or Register of Qualified Musicians," now being prepared for press. Without entering into the question as to whether the publication is likely to command the sympathies of members of the musical profession or not, considering its source, the proposal made that members should form a company to bring out this "Directory" is cool enough to have emanated from the frigid zone. The capital stated is £10,000 in pound shares. Investors like to have some hope of profit, but there does not seem any possibility of realising it. If 5,000 musicians were to subscribe for the "Directory," and a profit of two shillings on each copy were possible, a sum of five per cent. might be gained. No musical "Directory" that has ever been issued by the established firms has realised this amount of return, and it is therefore unlikely that a new proposal would be accepted by the public so as to justify the venture. Perhaps the Society of Science, &c., has neglected to consult the many eminent mathematicians attached to it, or perhaps its financiers are not equal to the calculations involved.

ST. MARTIN'S burial ground in Pratt Street, Camden Town, after lying waste for many years, is to be opened as a recreation ground. In that place lie the remains of Charles Dibdin, his tomb smothered with brick-bats and other refuse, the name "Charles Dibdin, &c., died 1814," and the lines in "Tom Bowling"—

His form was of the manliest beauty,
His heart was kind and soft;
Faithful below he did his duty,
And now he's gone aloft."

being almost undecipherable. In the same place lie the remains of John Davy, the composer of the "Bay of Biscay" and other songs still popular. Would it not be possible to raise some monuments worthy of the merits of these departed men of genius? Surely in the case of Dibdin alone, it is not necessary to show a want of gratitude towards one whose patriotic efforts ought ever to command attention and admiration. Tributes of respect to men of genius gone to their rest are the best encouragements to the living to emulate their acts and deeds.

THE endeavour to utilise musical terminology as a vehicle for political satire has been recently illustrated by a set of verses in the Saturday Review, modelled upon the famous "Groves of Blarney." There we read, amongst other wonderful sights, of—

An organ where ould Osborne Morgan
Plays wedding marches with Morganatic grace,
Or sings obligato to the Moonlight sonata
In the most funayreal tones of his bass.

This is not suggestive of a very accurate musical knowledge on the part of the writer. Musicians leave politics alone and may fairly claim reciprocity in this matter.

THE ROYAL ALBERT HALL CHORAL SOCIETY.

THE performances of this Society during the past month have been limited to repetitions of "Elijah" and "The Messiah," and therefore do not demand lengthy record. Mendelssohn's Oratorio was given on Saturday afternoon, the 4th ult., and attracted one of the largest audiences ever assembled in the Albert Hall. Indeed, money was refused for all parts of the huge building before the performance commenced. It is becoming increasingly evident that afternoon Concerts are destined to supersede in popularity those given in the evening, owing to the advantages they offer to suburban residents. The enormous crowd on the present occasion was drawn together simply by admiration for the work, the soloists, with one exception, being comparatively new to their respective tasks; or at any rate unassociated, in the public mind, with the parts they assumed. Madame Nordica's fine voice told well in the soprano music, and she very wisely refrained from the theatrical graces and mannerisms which proved so unpleasant on a previous occasion. Madame Belle Cole also showed some improvement in the management of her voice, and Miss Hannah Jones, a Royal Academy student, deserves a special word of approval for her careful delivery of the air "Woe unto them." Mr. Henschel, excellent artist as he is, could not make us forget Mr. Santley in the part of the Prophet. We lacked the intense fervour which our English baritone throws into his reading of the part; Mr. Henschel satisfied the mind, but he did not touch the heart. Mr. Lloyd sang the tenor airs—how, there is no reason to state.

"The Messiah" was given as usual on Ash Wednesday (15th ult.), and considering that it was a non-subscription Concert there was a large audience. As to the performance, there is nothing to say, save to compliment the Birmingham tenor, Mr. Charles Banks, on his progress as a vocalist. If he continues as he has begun a very high position will in due course be at his command. The other soloists were Madame Nordica, Madame Patey, and Mr. Watkin Mills.

NOVELLO'S ORATORIO CONCERTS.

AT the Concert of the 22nd ult., given at St. James's Hall, a new Concert Overture, composed by Mr. Oliver King, was presented to the public for the first time, the composer conducting the performance. The composition is undoubtedly clever, and if it is somewhat diffuse in form, it is marked by an amplitude of excellent ideas. There are many indications of ability in the scoring which could not fail to command the admiration of the attentive listener. The work was well received, and the author was not only applauded, but was enthusiastically recalled at the conclusion.

The choral work which followed—Sullivan's "Golden Legend"—was conducted by Dr. A. C. Mackenzie, and his appearance upon the platform was the signal for a demonstration of a remarkable kind. The audience and the choir were glad to see him in his old place, and their applause greeting had something of affection in its character. Moreover, the news of his election as Principal of the Royal Academy, only decided on the afternoon of the day of the Concert, increased the quality of this reception and made it more completely enthusiastic. The male members of the choir gave three lusty cheers, and would have followed them up with the customary one cheer more, had not the Conductor, anxious that they should reserve their best efforts for the work they had to do, entreated them by a significant gesture to take care of their throats. There was scarcely any need for the caution, for there seemed to be a plentiful reserve of force and will. The choruses throughout were magnificently sung—attack, intonation, and expression being all that could be wished. The pitch in the unaccompanied pieces "O gladsome light" and "O, pure in heart," was accurately sustained to the great augmentation of the impressiveness of the effect. The opening dramatic chorus of the fallen angels round Strasbourg tower, with the dignified boom of the bells, has rarely been productive of so fine a result as upon this occasion. The chanting of the Pilgrims and the final chorus "God sent His Messenger," were each given with that characteristic quality necessary for the full realisation of the composer's intention and the spirit of the poetry. The orchestral effects were well brought out, though the bells in the last part were not in perfect tune, for they remained unaffected by the increased temperature of the room, which sharpened the pitch of the orchestra. The tone produced was, however, not inconsistent with the poetical character of the subject, or at variance with the ordinary tone of chimes mingled with other sounds. The chief vocalists were Madame Nordica, Madame Patey, Mr. Edward Lloyd, Mr. Franklin Clive, and Mr. Watkin Mills. The efforts of all were well received by the audience, and where applause was possible it was offered in recognition. The work was given without pause, and the interest accumulated thereby was distinctly to the advantage of the composer's intention.

CRYSTAL PALACE.

THE Saturday Concerts were resumed on the 11th ult., in deplorable weather, which doubtless accounted for the sparse attendance. Still, rain and sleet ought not to exercise a deterrent influence when a violinist of Mr. Ondricek's calibre is advertised to play. Dvorák's Concerto, heard on this occasion for the first time at Sydenham, is, though an interesting work, by no means one of the most typical specimens of its composer's genius. Its diffuse and rhapsodic nature renders it almost impossible that an orchestra, even so good as that of the Crystal Palace, should do full justice to it at a first performance. Of Mr. Ondricek's share in the work it is impossible to speak too highly. He has gained in warmth since his last visit to England, while his purity of tone, his faultless exactness of tune, and wonderful execution remain as unsurpassable as ever. No living violinist could have improved upon his rendering of the Finale. As we heard it remarked, each of the notes in the opening theme stood out like diamonds, and the contrast between the fiery spirit of this and the dreamy languor of the other principal theme (that marked No. 13 in the programme) was brought out with wonderful effect. Later on Mr. Ondricek played a "Sérénade Mélancolique," by Tchaikowsky—a long-drawn plaintive air, in which his wealth of tone and singing quality were admirably exhibited—and a tawdry piece of musical pyrotechny by Laub, elevated from the commonplace by the astonishing brilliancy of his execution. In answer to a recall, the soloist, yielding to the temper of the audience, favoured them with one of Paganini's show pieces. Mr. Ondricek with his great gifts can safely disregard these cheap short cuts to the great heart of the musical public.

Wagner's "Faust" Overture, which opened the programme, is remarkable alike for its intrinsic as for its autobiographical interest. Between it and Mozart's Symphony in E flat a whole world of Sturm und Drang lies, and yet in the Andante there are not wanting those tragic touches which contradict those modern critics who label Mozart as "placid." Both these works, so widely different in character, received a fine interpretation from Mr. Manns. On the other hand, the familiar "Invitation to the Waltz" (Weber-Berlioz) was played with an unaccustomed want of elasticity. Mr. Sims Reeves being indisposed, his place was filled by Mr. Charles Banks, a new-comer, lately heard to advantage in the Albert Hall. Mr. Banks, who sang "If with all your hearts" ("Elijah") and Sullivan's "Distant shore," was so obviously out of voice that it would be unjust to regard his efforts on this occasion as a fair sample of his capacity; but he is to be strongly cautioned against the practice of unduly prolonging high notes at the end of songs.

The production on the same day of two novelties—Mr. Speer's "Day Dream" Cantata and Mr. Hamish MacCunn's Ballad for chorus and orchestra, "Lord Ullin's Daughter"—lent a special interest to the Concert of the 18th ult. On the merits of these respective works it is not our intention to dwell at any length here. It would be impossible to discover two compositions differing more radically in every essential:

the one sombre, but full of the "fougue de vingt ans"—the composer's age—of the swing, the extravagance of youth; the other marked by a cloying sweetness, a result to which Mr. Speer's predilection for chromatic modulations largely contributes. The difficulties of setting Tennyson's "Day Dream" are, in our opinion, immense; but the composer might at least have avoided the ineptitude of assigning the utterance of the King, "My beard has grown into my lap," to the soprano. The solo parts were taken by Miss Thudichum and Mr. Harper Kearton. The choruses were sung efficiently by the Crystal Palace choir, and the instrumental portion of the score was rendered with the precision that Mr. Manns invariably secures in the performance of a new work. Mr. Speer was very heartily applauded at the close of his Cantata. An obvious criticism suggested by an examination of Mr. MacCunn's score is that he makes somewhat exacting demands upon his voices. This may be necessary for the exposition of the dramatic treatment of Campbell's Ballad, which is made a strong point in the design. On the other hand, he displays a command of orchestral resource truly remarkable in one so young. There is a distinct Highland character in the music which largely augments its poetical colouring, and earns for his music the attention which the work of genius should excite. Best of all the features of this work is its entire freedom from musical platitudes and second-rate suavity. It has faults, but they proceed from a high spirit and audacity which augur happily for the future, when these qualities are controlled and curbed by experience. The programme also included the "Der Freischütz" Overture, Schubert's "Unfinished" Symphony, and Delibes's sparkling ballet suite "Sylvia."

MONDAY AND SATURDAY POPULAR CONCERTS.

THE work done during the past month at Mr. Arthur Chappell's entertainments has not been of a nature to require lengthy record, though the programmes have not been wholly devoid of features of special interest. For example, on Saturday, January 28, Signor Piatti introduced some pieces by Attilio Ariosti, the almost forgotten Italian composer, who was resident for a time in London early in the eighteenth century, when Italian Opera was first established. Ariosti's operas brought him some temporary fame, but along with Buononcini he fell out of favour when Handel appeared for the second time in this country, and, less fortunate than his compatriot, he did not succeed in obtaining a wealthy private patron. He published a book of Cantatas and "Lessons for the viola d'amore," an instrument on which he was a skilled performer, and then left England, his subsequent history being absolutely unknown. It was four numbers of his "Lessons" arranged for the violoncello, with piano accompaniment by Signor Piatti, which the distinguished artist performed on the present occasion. They are elegantly written trifles in the archaic Italian manner, but after hearing them one can fully understand how the more robust genius of Handel put an end to Ariosti's favour with the public. At this Concert Miss Fanny Davies played a selection of Schumann's charming "Davidsbündler," and was somewhat ill-advised not to give the entire work, which hardly bears mutilation. The concerted works were Mozart's Quintet in C and Beethoven's Trio in G (Op. 1, No. 2), and Mrs. Hutchinson sang agreeably airs by Handel, Haydn, and Bennett.

Two masterpieces of the first rank were included in the programme of the following Monday—namely, Beethoven's Sonata in A, for pianoforte and violoncello (Op. 69), and Mendelssohn's Quintet in B flat (Op. 87). We shall not venture upon an opinion as to which is the greater work of the two, but the latter has a peculiar association with these entertainments, as it was the opening item of the first Monday Popular Concert, twenty-nine years ago. The performance was magnificent, especially of the Adagio e Lento, Mendelssohn's finest slow movement. Miss Fanny Davies's piano solos should have been given in reverse order. Bach's great Fugue in A minor, which Spitta characterises as one of the finest, as it is the longest of the master's contrapuntal exercises, gave the effect of an anticlimax to Brahms's Rhapsody in G minor, though the piece is in the composer's best manner. Miss Liza Lehmann, whose delicate, charming style of singing renders her a great favourite at these Concerts, was encored in Schubert's "Who is Sylvia?"

Only four items comprised the programme of Saturday, the 4th ult., and our remarks may be correspondingly brief. The greatest attraction was Schubert's Octet, which seems to please more and more every time it is performed. It was given, as usual, with an interval after the third movement, an arrangement which affords almost necessary relief to the hearers as well as to the players. The only other important work was Mendelssohn's Sonata in D, for piano and violoncello (Op. 58). The vocalist and pianist were the same as at the previous Concert, Miss Liza Lehmann giving the old English air "The three ravens" and Miss Maude White's charming "June" song, while Miss Fanny Davies was perfectly safe in three of Scarlatti's pieces or sonatas.

It is not often that an alteration at the last moment has to be made in the programme of a Monday Popular Concert, but an exception occurred on the 6th ult. The first work on the list was Brahms's Quartet in C minor (Op. 51, No. 2), but owing to a slight injury to her right hand Madame Néruda was unable to rehearse it, and Haydn's far easier Quartet in E flat (Op. 71, No. 3) was substituted. It is more than possible that to some of the audience the change was not unwelcome, though everyone must have regretted its cause, for Brahms's work does not exhibit him in his most genial mood. That earnest and conscientious English pianist, Madame Frickenhaus, made her first appearance this season and essayed Schumann's Sonata in G minor (Op. 22). The choice, as it proved, was somewhat unfortunate, for the work did not display the executant to advantage. Her rendering was technically accurate, but it lacked true expression and the poetic music did not therefore create its full effect. Madame Frickenhaus is heard to greater advantage in works of a less romantic character. Mdlle. Gambogi, whose voice has been well trained, was favourably received in airs by Handel and Godard. Beethoven's Septet, still one of the most popular works in the entire repertory, closed this Concert.

Mr. Arthur Chappell may be congratulated on the zeal and fidelity of his Saturday patrons. The weather on the 11th ult. was of the most ungenial description, but the hall was nearly as full as usual. Perhaps the most remarkable feature of the Concert was that the whole of the executants were of the sterner sex, this being a somewhat rare occurrence. The leader was Herr Heermann, who made an extremely favourable impression a year or two ago and strengthened it on the present occasion. He is a remarkably able player, his tone being rich and full and his execution true in intonation and warm in expression. These qualities were exhibited alike in Mozart's Quartet in G, No. 1, and in his principal solo, Ernst's "Hommage à Molière." Mr. Max Pauer made his first appearance this season and showed the progress he is still making as an artist by an excellent performance of Chopin's Sonata in B minor (Op. 58). The work itself is not particularly interesting, but Mr. Pauer brought out all its good points and mastered its difficulties with apparent ease. Rubinstein's Trio in B flat (Op. 52) also exhibited both the new-comers to advantage, as the work is full of brilliant effects and may be regarded as one of the Russian composer's most satisfactory efforts. Mr. Santley's vocal selections do not call for remark.

The largest Monday audience since the famous Josef Hofmann nights assembled to greet Herr Joachim on the 13th ult., though the meteorological conditions were even worse than on the previous Saturday. More than this, the crowd of amateurs seemed in the most genial mood and enthusiasm prevailed throughout the evening. The great violinist had such a reception as might have unnerved a less experienced artist, and by his masterly leadership of Mendelssohn's Octet at once proved that he was in full possession of his unrivalled powers. We have never heard a more spirited performance of this extraordinary example of youthful genius. Herr Joachim's solo consisted of the Adagio and Allegro from Bach's Sonata in C, one of those works for a long time pronounced unplayable, but which in his hands seem comparatively simple. For an encore he gave a movement from the companion Sonata in G minor. The audience had some excuse for not resting satisfied with such a short though difficult piece as Schumann's Toccata in C (Op. 7), and Mr. Max Pauer, who played it with noteworthy vigour and brilliancy, gave one of Schumann's Novelletten as an encore. As the vocal music was contributed by Mrs. Henschel it is needless to say that it was exquisitely interpreted. Her songs were two of Schubert's Lieder and her husband's very piquant and tasteful "Adieux de l'Hôtesse Arabe," accompanied of course by the composer. Haydn's Quartet in E flat (Op. 64, No. 2) concluded this very enjoyable Concert.

The only item in the Concert of the following Saturday that could in any sense be termed unfamiliar was Grieg's quaint and very pleasing pianoforte suite "Aus Holberg's Zeit." We noticed this work, which though admittedly written in the style of a bygone age is full of original touches, when it was first introduced last season. The executant on the present occasion was Mr. Max Pauer, whose playing gave such perfect satisfaction to the audience that an encore was insisted upon. Herr Joachim is expected to play Bach's Chaconne at least once every season, and he performed the duty on the present occasion in his customary inimitable manner. Of Beethoven's Quartet in E flat (Op. 74) and Schumann's Trio in D minor (Op. 63) it is of course unnecessary to speak.

The Concert of Monday, the 20th ult., may be dismissed with almost equal conciseness. It would be mere waste of space to describe how Beethoven's Quintet in C (Op. 29) and Mendelssohn's Trio in C minor (Op. 66) were performed, or how Herr Joachim played Leclair's somewhat hackneyed Sarabande and Tambourin from the Sonata in D (No. 3). It may be true, as the programme stated, that the greater part of the old French composer's music is long since out of date, but now and then some other excerpts might be introduced, if only for the sake of variety. It is always agreeable to note improvement in a young artist, and we must congratulate Miss Mathilde Wurm on the advance she has made as a pianist since she first appeared at St. James's Hall. Her rendering of Schumann's Papillons (Op. 2) was distinguished by charming lightness and delicacy, in keeping with the piquant and fanciful nature of the music. Miss Marguerite Hall is one of those vocalists who do not weary the audience with thread-bare songs. On this occasion she sang with great purity of style Brahms's clever and pleasing "Geistliches Wiegenlied," founded on an old Catholic Hymn. The viola obbligato was well played by Mr. Hollander.

LONDON SYMPHONY CONCERTS.

THE time is happily past when English composers could not gain a hearing for their efforts on account of the national prejudice against music of home manufacture, and Mr. Marshall Hall, who, we are told, has written three grand operas, several overtures, a symphony, string quartets, and many other things, must be counted exceptionally unfortunate. Until the Symphony Concert of the 2nd ult. his name had never appeared in a concert programme. Whether Mr. Henschel's motive in giving him a place was genuine belief in his abilities or merely artistic compassion, is of no consequence; a composition, or rather an excerpt, was submitted for judgment, and judgment must be passed upon it fairly and without favour. It was called a Scena, but it is really a baseless declamatory solo from an opera entitled "Harold," and is supposed to be delivered by Earl Godwin when defending himself before the Witan in Westminster Hall. Here there is an obvious anachronism, for Westminster Hall was not built until the time of William Rufus; but that constitutes the least of Mr. Marshall Hall's offences. He has studied Wagner deeply, and apparently thinks that the most advanced methods of the Bayreuth revolutionist should be adopted by a young English composer. The voice part is most ungrateful to the singer, who, moreover, has to contend against a mass of surging, furious orchestration. One theme of a rhythmical character appears, but it is so tortured by its harmonic surroundings that its effect is lost. But beneath all this extravagance we discerned signs of genuine power, and if Mr. Marshall Hall will realise that he has commenced at the wrong end he may yet do honour to English art. Mr. Santley did everything that was possible with his piece, and a sympathetic audience received it kindly. The rest of the programme was excellently chosen, but it does not need to be considered at length. It included Schumann's "Manfred" Overture, Wagner's "Meistersinger," Mozart's Symphony in G minor, and Beethoven's Pianoforte Concerto in G, the rendering of which, by Miss Fanny Davies, was noteworthy as much for purity of style as for technical perfection. Indeed, her reading of the work greatly resembled that of her revered instructress, Madame Schumann, whose admirable cadences she introduced.

As the anniversary of Wagner's death fell on a Monday this year, Mr. Henschel commemorated the event six days earlier—namely, on Tuesday, the 7th ult. The scheme consisted of Beethoven's "Eroica" Symphony, the appropriateness of which could not be called in question, and some pieces by Wagner himself, which have been rendered very familiar at the Richter and other Concerts. The Symphony was on the whole extremely well played, the sublime Funeral March receiving special justice. On the other hand, the Vorspiel and Liebestod from "Tristan and Isolde," and the Siegfried Idyl were taken at such a slow pace as materially to injure their effect, the enthusiasm of the immense audience being due rather to the popularity of the compositions than to the merits of the performance. The Prelude from "Parsifal" received a far larger measure of justice, and the noisy "Kaiser" March closed the Concert, which, from a financial point of view, was the most successful of the season.

Mr. Henschel's enterprise in bringing every available novelty of interest to a hearing deserves the hearty thanks of musicians, and the obligations under which he has already placed them were greatly increased at the Concert of Wednesday, the 15th ult., when Brahms's double Concerto for violin and violoncello was performed for the first time in England. The work is not yet published, and was only produced as recently as October 18 last at Leipzig, the executants then and at every subsequent performance being Herr Joachim and Herr Hausmann. A composer so thoroughly conservative in his tendencies as Johannes Brahms was scarcely likely to work without a precedent, and of course many examples of double, triple, and even quadruple Concertos may be found among the scores of the great masters; but it is at first sight not a little curious that not one such work has ever attained general popularity. It may be that the public are naturally attracted more by the individuality of one great artist than by the skill of several in combination; but concert-givers have a more prosaic reason for preferring single Concertos, for they can be performed at less expense. Whether Brahms's latest effort is destined to prove an exception to the rule cannot be predicted with confidence; its merits are sufficient to entitle it to the admiration of musicians, though perhaps not great enough to arouse special enthusiasm. A brief description of the work will make this remark clear to our readers. The first movement, in A minor, is planned on a large and elaborate scale and is altogether the most important of the three. It opens, like Beethoven's Concerto in E flat, with some bravura passages for the solo instruments, but more extended and partaking of the nature of a brilliant cadenza. Then follows the orthodox exposition of the subjects by the orchestra, the first being rather brusque and uncompromising, and the second of a tender, yearning character. This excellent contrast in the thematic material is turned to excellent account in the course of the movement which, as may be expected, is built on established lines throughout. Its general character is symphonic, that is to say, the orchestra and the solo instruments have each their share in the working out of the design, the latter indeed being, at times, scarcely distinguishable owing to the intricacy of the polyphonic writing. The effect, however, is seldom obscure; on the contrary, Brahms has seldom in an important movement preserved lucidity of utterance so well, and we regard this section of the Concerto as being in his finest and loftiest manner. The popular verdict, however, is likely to rest with the second movement, an Andante in D, idyllic in nature, and so purely melodious that it can be appreciated at once. Unfortunately the Finale, a Rondo in the original key, exhibits a marked falling off, despite the brightness of the themes. A rare fault with Brahms, it is patchy in construction, and the composer seems to have felt that he was not doing his best, for he brings the work to an abrupt conclusion without the imposing peroration for which one looks. It would be well for him to subject this portion of the Concerto to revision before submitting it to the world in print. With such distinguished executants the performance could not be otherwise than magnificent, and the reception of the work was nothing short of enthusiastic. The remainder of the programme included Haydn's Symphony in C (No. 1 of the Salomon set), Mendelssohn's Overture to "St Paul," and solos for Herr Joachim and Herr Hausmann.

Brahms's new double Concerto was repeated at the fourteenth Concert, on Tuesday evening, the 21st ult., and was again very warmly received by a large audience. On this occasion, however, there were other works in the programme calling for some notice. After the deep thought and weighty utterances of the greatest of living German composers, Volkmann's light and pretty Serenade in F, for strings, came as a much needed relief. The work is virtually a ballet suite in four movements, and, if we mistake not, the third section, a Waltz in B flat, has been utilised in opera. More interesting to English musicians was Mr. Hamish MacCunn's Ballad for orchestra "The Ship o' the Fiend." On his appearance to conduct the work the composer had a cordial reception, and it may be said that the expectations formed by the success of his pieces performed at the Crystal Palace were fully realised. The Scottish poem which forms the source of his inspiration in the present instance bears a resemblance to that of Burger's "Lenore," the Bohemian legend on which Dvorák has founded "The Spectre's Bride," and to many another story of an erring bride and a ghostly bridegroom. In Mr. MacCunn's work the foundation is nautical, and his illustration is wonderfully vivid and picturesque, both in the treatment of the themes and the orchestral colouring. Whether the young Scottish musician will be as successful in the domain of abstract music as he is in the delineation of national subjects remains to be proved; in the latter, the talent he has already displayed is so remarkable as to awaken very high expectations.

SACRED HARMONIC SOCIETY.

THE only performance by the Association bearing this time-honoured title which calls for notice this month was that of "Elijah," on the 23rd ult. Mr. W. H. Cummings may be congratulated on a very satisfactory rendering of Mendelssohn's popular Oratorio, the cast of soloists being as strong as could be desired, while the choir was in its best form. Fortunately, Mr. Santley was in magnificent voice, and has never sung the part of the Prophet with greater power and impressiveness. If Miss Pauline Cramer's fine soprano voice were under perfect control she would take a place in the highest rank of oratorio singers. On the present occasion she commenced unsatisfactorily, but greatly improved afterwards, and her rendering of "Hear ye, Israel," was as artistic and intelligent as could be wished. Of the efforts of Madame Patey and Mr. Lloyd nothing need be said; but a word of encouragement is due to Miss Alice Suter, whose sympathetic contralto voice told well in the air "Woe unto them," though she was evidently embarrassed by nervousness. Miss Agnes Larkcom was very acceptable in the subordinate soprano music.

THE ROYAL ACADEMY OF MUSIC.

THE last Concert before the interregnum came to an end took place at St. James's Hall, on Friday afternoon, the 17th ult., and, artistically speaking, was a marked success. In other words, the ability displayed by the students who took part in the programme was above the average, and Dr. Mackenzie, the new Principal, may be congratulated on the high position and satisfactory working order of the Institution at the time of his assumption of office. The work presented by the pupils at this Concert may be divided into creative and executive. In the former department the most important item was a set of Variations for two pianofortes on a theme by the late Sir G. A. Macfarren, composed by Miss Dora Bright. In this effort a high degree of musicianship and considerable knowledge of effect are to be found in combination, and as the rendering by the Composer and Miss Ethel Boyce was in every respect satisfactory it was exceedingly well received. We must also praise the contrapuntal proficiency displayed by Miss Rose Meyer in a Prelude and Fugue in C for piano-forte. Other new compositions were introduced, but they were of a lower order of merit, and need no individual reference. Turning to the instrumental performances, high commendation is due to Miss Amy Horrocks and Mr. Allen Gill for their rendering of three movements of Mendelssohn's Sonata in D, for piano and violoncello, and to three other pianists, Mr. Albert Fox (Sterndale Bennett scholar), Miss Sophie Crews, and Miss E. T. Sellar. The best vocal effort was that of Miss Julia Neilson in Mendelssohn's "Hear my prayer." This young lady has a beautiful soprano voice and is rapidly improving.

PIANOFORTE RECITALS.

ONE of the most noteworthy features of the past month has been the number of Pianoforte Recitals by young executants who, it is reasonable to believe, will in due course attain higher artistic rank than they at present possess. Perhaps these words may seem scarcely applicable to Miss Fanny Davies, whose performance at the Princes' Hall, on Wednesday, the 1st ult., is the first to claim attention. But gratitude is said to be a lively sense of favours to come, and Miss Davies has already given proofs of ability so far above the average that we are justified in hoping greater things from her in the future. The only fault that can be found with the programme of her Recital is that it was too modest. There were but five items in all, though it is true two of them were such important works as Beethoven's "Waldstein" Sonata and Schumann's Etudes Symphoniques. In the first-named masterpiece Miss Davies was scarcely at her best. The performance had many good points, but at times the player seemed a little flurried, and the sublime Adagio was taken decidedly too fast. On the other hand, the rendering of Schumann's great work was one of the finest and most satisfying we have heard for a long time past. The young artist seemed to have fully grasped the spirit and meaning of the composer, and his changeful moods were all adequately reproduced in a manner not often equalled by pianists of the highest reputation. By this performance Miss Fanny Davies gave proof of exceptional gifts well cultivated. Brahms's Rhapsodie in G minor (Op. 79, No. 2), one of Mendelssohn's "Lieder ohne Worte," and Rubinstein's Staccato Etude completed her brief selection, to which scarcely necessary relief was given by the singing of Fräulein Hedwig Sicca. In spite of a pronounced German method, this young lady made a favourable impression in songs by five composers of her own nationality.

Madame de Pachmann had a large and sympathetic audience at her Recital at the Princes' Hall, on Monday, the 6th ult. As Miss Maggie Okey the young lady was favourably known some years ago, but after her marriage with M. de Pachmann she did not appear again in public until November last, when she played at a Crystal Palace Concert. It is understood that, during the interval, she has studied diligently under the guidance of her accomplished husband, and doubtless the public was curious to note the effect of his teaching. It may be said at once that Madame de Pachmann is a very charming executant within certain limits, her touch being peculiarly musical and absolutely devoid of hardness, while her execution of rapid passages is very true and even. Power and passion, however, are wanting, and we fancy she will always be heard to the fullest advantage in a room of moderate size, and in music suited to her style and idiosyncrasy. For example, Brahms's fine Sonata in F minor (Op. 5) needed more breadth and intellectuality than Madame de Pachmann supplied, while, on the other hand, it is impossible to imagine better performances of such pieces as Schubert's Impromptu in G (Op. 90, No. 3), Chopin's Etude in G sharp minor, the Andante Spianato, and Henselt's "Si oiseau j'étais." In these, the soft pure tone and the perfect delicacy of style were of the utmost advantage in the production of the effect desired, and the satisfaction of the audience was expressed in repeated demands for encores, which in every instance the artist wisely declined to grant. Two pieces from her own pen, a "Thème et Variations" in G minor and a "Rêverie du Lac," show that she has considerable talent for composition. The second is only an elegant trifle, but the former is written with a large amount of musicianly skill, and left a very favourable impression.

A new pianist, pupil of Mr. Wingham at the Guildhall School of Music, appeared at St. James's Hall on the 8th ult. The young lady belongs to a Polish family, which on settling in London some time ago took the name under which she now appears. Miss Barnett is not, therefore, to be confounded with any member of another family long celebrated in connection with musical art. It is an open question whether Mr. Wingham's very talented pupil might not have put off her début some time longer—at all events, till greater maturity of bodily power had given her greater strength. Miss Barnett, who is petite and, apparently, little more than a child, lacks force, just as much as she wants breadth of style and robustness of expression. Her performance of Beethoven's Thirty-two Variations was, consequently, a mistake, at the committal of which we are somewhat surprised. The young artist proved far more successful in works of smaller calibre, requiring daintiness and delicacy of treatment. Playing these, she had her audience with her, and accomplished a success not less deserved than positive. Her most decided "hits" were made in Sterndale Bennett's "Rondeau à la Polonoise," Chopin's Berceuse, and a pretty Barcarole by her master. Great facility, a high degree of artistic sensibility, and refinement carried almost to the point of exaggeration were noticeable features throughout the Recital, and established Miss Barnett's position as a youthful pianist whose career may be expected to repay any interest taken in it.

MR. CHARLES WADE'S CHAMBER CONCERTS.

DRIVEN from the Grosvenor Gallery by the stern decree forbidding Concert-givers to desecrate that temple of art with their unholy sounds what time its walls are hung with precious masterpieces, Mr. Charles Wade has been forced, for his present series of Chamber Concerts, to fall back upon the less exalted but perhaps more convenient locale of the Princes' Hall. There, on the 21st ult., the first of four Concerts took place, a large and fashionable audience attending. The feature of the evening was the first appearance in England of the Cologne Conservatoire String Quartet, comprising Mr. Gustav Hollaender (first violin), Mr. Joseph Schwarz (second violin), Mr. Carl Körner (viola), and Mr. Louis Hegyesi (violoncello). Of these the first and last-named artists had already made themselves favourably known here as soloists and chamber executants, having, indeed, taken part in Concerts previously given by Mr. Wade. As now constituted under the above title, the Cologne players were heard to advantage in Mozart's C major Quartet—the last of the famous set of six dedicated to Haydn—and a couple of bracketed movements—viz., the Canzonetta from Mendelssohn's early Quartet in E flat and the Minuet by Boccherini. A complete work, however short, would decidedly have been preferable to these excerpts, no matter how great their popularity or how admirable their interpretation. In any case, we should like to hear the Cologne Conservatoire Quartet engaged upon some more exacting task before estimating their precise claims to the esteem of English amateurs. Mr. Hollaender, who commands a pleasing tone, just intonation, and intelligent phrasing, gave as a solo an effective Rêverie of his own; while Mr. Hegyesi won loud applause for his sympathetic rendering of pieces by Weber and Schumann. Mrs. Henschel sang in her customary perfect manner Liszt's "Loreley," Schumann's "Der Nussbaum," and Brahms's "Meine Liebe ist grün." Mr. Wade contributed airs by Scarlatti and Buononcini, and F. Clay's Barcarole, "My bark is ready." He also joined Mrs. Henschel in the duet "Du repos voici l'heure," from Gounod's "Phlémon et Baucis." Mr. Wade would be well-advised, though, not to sing in French, especially when he runs the risk of comparison with another vocalist who pronounces the language well. There was no pianist at this Concert. The accompaniments were neatly and tastefully played by Mr. C. Hopkins Ould.

BOW AND BROMLEY INSTITUTE.

THE remarkable and growing activity and vigour of suburban choral societies may be regarded as one of the most encouraging features in the musical work of the present time. Not only are the most important new productions prepared and rendered in a manner worthy to compare with what is done at the principal London concert halls, but in some cases works are heard for the first time under the auspices of these energetic bodies. An instance occurred on January 30, when Mr. Alfred Gaul's Cantata "Joan of Arc" was performed at the Bow and Bromley Institute. The astonishing popularity of "The Holy City" rendered the appearance of a new work from the same pen an event of some interest, more especially to the innumerable minor associations who found the Birmingham Cantata so well suited to their needs. It would, of course, be unreasonable to expect that "Joan of Arc" will meet with equally wide acceptance. The subject is less likely to attract the sympathies of the community at large, outside the comparatively limited circle of musical amateurs, and in treating it both the librettist and the composer had to observe certain limitations lest they should make the work too pretentious. Mr. Frederick Enoch is not, perhaps, to be severely blamed for the fragmentary way in which the heroic story is presented, nor for the shadowy nature of the characters. At any rate, he has not embellished history save by the introduction of a rejected lover of Joan, and this was done for the purpose of providing a part for a tenor. Instead of describing the score number by number, we shall be content with calling attention to the more attractive portions, and the general features of Mr. Gaul's music. A good impression is made at the outset by the very pretty pastoral chorus "Hail, to the beautiful morning of May," and those who like a ballad will be equally pleased with the air Philip (the lover) sings in praise of Joan, "There is no one like her." The next number that strikes attention is a spirited baritone song, "Who would not fight for freedom," written, somewhat oddly, in bolero rhythm. Equally melodious and taking are a duet for tenor and baritone, "Full flows the river," and Joan's ballad-like air, "A simple, simple ring." Hitherto the solo voices have had the most attractive music, but the chorus has its revenge in a remarkably spirited and martial number, "On to the battle, on," certain to please any audience. There is also a good deal of swing in the succeeding trio, "Lead ye on the men at arms," and shortly afterwards Mr. Gaul shows that he recognises the advantages of contrast by giving us a beautiful "Ave Maria," one of the most musically pieces in the work. The tragic close now approaches, and after the taking of Joan has been graphically described, her mysterious "Voices," which are always represented by the female contingent of the choir, have a charming chorus, "Fret not thyself to-day," which was more applauded than anything else in the work. The actual Finale is very brief, but by no means wanting in impressiveness. It would be incorrect to say that Mr. Gaul's music, as a whole, is either very original or very powerful, but it falls very pleasantly on the ear, and in genuine artistic qualities we think it is an advance on "The Holy City." That the large and attentive audience at Bow appreciated it was evident, for the composer, who presided at the organ, had several times to bow in response to the applause, and at the close he was warmly cheered. The performance was fairly good, though neither chorus, orchestra, nor soloists were perfect. Of the last-named, the best were Miss Alice Holland, who sang the music of Joan in a quietly artistic manner, and Mr. Lloyd James, who displayed a good tenor voice as the imaginary Philip.

STOCK EXCHANGE ORCHESTRAL SOCIETY.

THE work done by amateur Orchestral Societies in London is rapidly increasing in importance and interest. Leaving out of account small local organisations, which are numerous, we have five or six large and fully equipped bodies which appeal to the regular musical public with boldness and with steadily growing artistic success. Of these the Stock Exchange Orchestral Society is one of the most recently formed, and also one of the most vigorous. It has for its Conductor Mr. George Kitchin, who appears to be well qualified for his somewhat arduous duties. According to the list given in the programme of the Concert at St. James's Hall, on the 16th ult., the string contingent alone numbers fifty-eight players, a force requiring to be handled with tact and judgment. The neglected Symphonies of Haydn offer a mine of wealth to associations of this kind, and on this occasion No. 10 of the Salomon set, in E flat, was performed in a highly creditable manner. The same remark will apply to the rendering of Cherubini's Overture "Les Abencérages," while Sterndale Bennett's "Paradise and the Peri" proved a little beyond the collective means of the executants—that is to say, the notes were played, but a good deal was wanting in respect of unity and delicacy.

THE MUSICAL ASSOCIATION.

AT the meeting on the 6th ult. Mr. H. C. Banister read a most able and sympathetic paper on "The Life and Work of Sir G. A. Macfarren," and referred to the peculiar pleasure he felt in doing so, inasmuch as his father (Henry Joshua Banister, the violoncellist) was one of the earliest to recognise the powers of the young musician who was destined to become so great, and had indeed given him his first commission—viz., to write some compositions for the violoncello and piano. The lecturer passed in review the events of importance in the composer's life, and added many details derived from a long and intimate personal acquaintance with him, of his indomitable energy and industry. The leading events in Sir George Macfarren's career are familiar to most people, but it is not generally known perhaps that, in addition to studying the piano and trombone, he acquired some practical knowledge of the clarinet, and wrote an instruction book for the instrument. His rapidity of production was very great. The Overture "Chevy Chase" was written in a single night, in time for the rehearsal on the following day; while the music for an "Emblematical Tribute," on the occasion of the Queen's marriage, was composed under circumstances of similar pressure. Mr. Banister concluded by asking who shall succeed him, not in any particular office or position, but as the all-round man whose attainments commanded recognition from all? While none perhaps could hope to fill the void he left, yet his example remained, and all could emulate his single-mindedness of aim, his perseverance, and his unflinching industry.

"THE BARBER OF BAGDAD."

PETER CORNELIUS's opera "The Barber of Bagdad" has been recently performed at Weimar, and the event is doubly interesting when one bears in mind the reception this work had met with there some twenty-nine years previously.

The following slight account of the performance, taken from a Weimar paper, is therefore not without significance.

"The second opera of the evening was 'The Barber of Bagdad,' written and composed by Peter Cornelius. We were somewhat prejudiced against this work, because the advanced musical party was so loud in his praises, but we now ask pardon of the genial and immortalised author.

"He was born in 1824, and died in 1874, and was a nephew of the celebrated painter of the same name. During the years 1853-1860* he lived in Weimar, in intimate intercourse with Liszt, where, in 1859, his magnificent work was hissed off the stage! Let us pass over in silence this blot on the musical history of the 'City of the Muses' (Weimar); it is for our generation now to atone for the sins of the previous one. Let us hope that this will come to pass!

"Cornelius's opera is the most important dramatic-musical work which has appeared in recent times. It far surpasses the Wagner operas in subtlety of instrumentation and in delicacy of structure, and possesses with these qualities a musical foundation which in Wagner's hands would have served for ten operas, especially with their well-known bald wastes and spun-out portions.* It is, in short, a true music-drama, the only one of recent times to which the definition of 'Classical' can be given, that is according to the scientific definition of this idea, and not according to the Wagner philosophy.

"Were we to attempt to point out the musical beauties of this work, we should have to quote each bar—or, at any rate, each number—which does not come within the limits of a criticism in a daily paper. Yet we cannot forbear giving one word of warning, namely, that the beauty of the work can only be understood by the really cultivated musician at a first hearing, and that works such as this are not calculated for the amusement of the loungers at a garden-concert."

A short criticism on the performers follows, after which the writer concludes thus:—

"Such musical pearls, and (to continue the simile) polished with such consummate art as are to be found at the opening of the second act, will not vanish from the memory. Scenically also everything was ably carried out. We conclude with the remark that this work came out before Wagner's 'Meistersinger,' and that the Bayreuth Master was acquainted with the score of this; hence we shall understand whom we have to accuse of imitation with regard to a certain similarity in the conception of the Barber and Beckmesser on the one hand, and in the castigation scene on the other. In the service of art we feel it our duty to express our thanks to the theatre managers for the performance of this work."

DR. STANFORD'S "IRISH" SYMPHONY IN GERMANY.

A FEW months ago we had occasion to show, by unquestionable facts and quotations, the unworthy treatment which Sir Arthur Sullivan's "Golden Legend" received from the press of Berlin. Our reference to the matter again is not for the purpose of re-opening an old wound, nor even to make an opportunity of saying that the acerbity of the German critics may have been intensified by considerations with which the merits or demerits of Sullivan's music had nothing to do. It is for the sake of contrast that we call up the recent past, throwing thus into stronger relief the courtesy, consideration, and frank approval which have just been extended to another representative of our insular art. We cordially resented what was thought to be an undeserved slight; let us as cordially recognise and applaud a well-bestowed honour.

When Professor Villiers Stanford took his "Irish" Symphony to Germany the other day, he did not go as a stranger to a strange land. The Professor is a persona grata in the country of the great masters. His works show how much he sympathises with peculiarly German developments of the art; he is on friendly terms with the leaders of musical faith and practice, and as a composer he is not unknown, especially in Hamburg, where four years ago his "Savonarola" was played. In proceeding to lay before Teutonic connoisseurs the ripest fruit of his talent, he did not, therefore, go with the desolate feeling of one whom nobody knows and for whom nobody at first is greatly disposed to care. Professor Stanford may be congratulated upon the fact that men like Hans von Bülow became, in some sort, the guarantors of his worth to their countrymen. Better this than any favour of Courts and princes. The whole Almanack de Gotha cannot make a popular composer, whose position depends upon the suffrages of a republic whereof all men cultivated in art and letters are free and independent citizens.

This lucky representative of British music was fortunate in another respect. We say nothing now about the workmanship of his "Irish" Symphony, though that is a very important feature in the case. But not unimportant, certainly, is the fact that Professor Stanford took with him a work based upon national melodies as fresh, piquant, and beautiful as are to be found in any country of the world. It is not likely that more than a few German amateurs are familiar with the "Irische Lieder" arranged by Beethoven; the harp of Erin being represented to the mass probably by "The Last Rose of Summer" as it is in Flotow's "Martha." The Professor's Symphony, therefore, came big with a revelation of melodic beauty, such as occurs only once in a way. Each theme is a gem of its kind, even in the sight of those to the manner born; to the Germans strangeness must have enhanced its beauty. As to the construction of the work—the manner in which the old melodies are made subservient to classic design and wrought up into a consistent whole—we need not remind those who are acquainted with the Symphony that its merits, under this head, are so manifest and of such a character that even the strongest prejudice could not belittle or deny them. All things considered, the success of Dr. Stanford's composition might safely have been discounted, and, as many of us expected, the piece was received with extreme cordiality; in other words, it was as fortunate in Germany as elsewhere.

We have before us notices of the "Irish" Symphony by the critics or correspondents of the Hamburgische Musik-Zeitung, the Kölnischer Zeitung, the Hamburger Fremden-Blatt, and the Allgemeine Musik-Zeitung. These journals are practically unanimous in praise of the work, and it is noteworthy that all of them describe it as important (bedeutende). We need not give their opinions in detail, because they cover the same ground as that travelled over by the English press in its observations upon the Symphony, and do so in the same manner, commending the happy choice of national themes, the composer's sound workmanship, and the unquestionable interest and charm of each movement. The "Irish," however, was hardly so much on its trial as the fairness of the German critics, who have not always given us reason to think that they hold the scales of justice quite upright. We congratulate them upon their handsome behaviour to Dr. Stanford, doing so none the less because it was in the nature of things that they should be influenced by Dr. von Bülow's undisguised admiration for his work. Moreover, we congratulate English music upon an important success. Whatever we may think of the present state of art in the "Fatherland," all must agree that it is extremely desirable to obtain German approval for the productions of our composers. This is a very different case from that of French music in Germany. The productions of Gallic composers are often welcomed there for the relief and change they bring, as products of an entirely different school and a contrasted national temperament. But the Englishman is the descendant, speaking generally, of a migrated German. The family relationship is still obvious, and English music, especially as affected by intimate artistic connection with our Teutonic cousins, is German music, so to speak, only "once removed." The necessary consequences of this must be obvious. English music in Germany comes as the rival of German music on its own ground, and is naturally subjected to more than usual scrutiny, when it has succeeded in engaging serious attention at all. Allowing for the operation of prejudice, from which no man can be entirely free, we may, therefore, test the advance of our national art by the attitude of German amateurs towards it. Judged by this standard, we certainly have every reason for encouragement and satisfaction. Again and again of late British music has been performed in the hearing of Beethoven's countrymen, and that with a measure of success which, under the circumstances, we may regard as thoroughly well deserved—at all events, as not being the product of any prepossession.

Our remarks should not close without acknowledgment of the very cordial sympathy shown by Dr. von Bülow, to whom the performance of the "Irish" Symphony in Berlin and Hamburg was due. The Doctor, we are informed, had actually taken the trouble to get the work by heart—at any rate, he conducted the performance without book, and in other ways showed a keen interest in its success. Courtesies of this kind, as between representative musicians of different nations, are not lost. They tend to the mutual sympathy and solidarité which should prevail in the best interests of a common art. So to an equal extent does such frank enthusiasm as that shown by the Berlin Philharmonic audience when the Symphony was performed there. A correspondent writes: "Dr. Stanford was called six times, and the usually cold Berliners got up and cheered like undergraduates. Moreover, they repeated the work on the following night, made Dr. Stanford conduct it before he went to the train homewards, and encored their own enthusiasm as well." This is all very good.

* We give the criticism verbatim as it appeared in the German paper, but think it is a pity that the writer attempts to cry up one Master by depreciation of another, especially as this is the last thing that either Cornelius or Wagner would have wished, they being firm friends, and each capable of admiring the other's genius.

THE WILL OF JENNY LIND.

PROBATE has been granted of the will, dated May 15, 1886, with a codicil made August 29, 1887, of Madame Jenny Maria Lind-Goldschmidt, who died on November 2 last, aged 67 years, at Colwall, Herefordshire. She bequeaths to the King of Sweden her painting, "The Inundation"; to Mrs. Victor Benecke the portrait of Mendelssohn; to her grandson, Victor Francis Maude, the cabinet of books given to her by the Fire Companies of New York; and to the Royal Museum at Stockholm the gold, silver, and bronze medals struck in her honour, and the gold medal with diamond crown and a giraffe, graciously presented to her by King Oscar the Second, to be worn with the riband of Zeraphine. She devises the freehold estate of Wynd's Point, purchased from the "private fund" of 100,000 dollars American, settled on her on her marriage, to her husband, Otto Goldschmidt, and bequeaths from the said private fund, now about £13,610, annuities of Swedish kroner, £1,300 to Josephina Ahmanson, £150 to Frau Victor Perman, £200 to Amelia Perman, £100 to Louisa Stromberg, and £300 to Louisa Celsing; an annuity of £80 to her maid, Sophia Kedzie; a legacy of 50,000 (Swedish kroner) to the University of Upsala, to be called "The Eric Guslof Gezler Stipend," for the maintenance of poor students at the University; 50,000 (kroner) to the University of Lund, to be called "the Bishop Isaias Tegner Stipend," for the maintenance of poor students intending to enter the Protestant Church, and the residue of the said private fund to such hospital in Stockholm, wholly or principally devoted to the treatment of the diseases of children, as the trustees may choose. Subject to the life-interest of her husband, the testatrix appoints the "common fund" settled on her marriage, and consisting of the remainder of her then property, as to one-third each in trust for her sons Walter Otto and Ernest Svend David Goldschmidt, and her daughter, Jenny Maria Katherine, the wife of Raymond William de Latham Maude, and she recites that she had previously settled on each £5,000 from her moiety of a so-called "joint fund" derived from joint earnings of her husband and herself, which, although his by law, were at his desire settled as to one moiety, or not less than £15,000, to her appointment. The executors are the said Otto Goldschmidt, Edward Wingfield, and Richard Du Cane, and the value of the personality is declared at £40,630 13s. 8d.

THE CLAVI-HARP.

THE clavi-harp is a new musical instrument invented by Mr. Dietz, of Brussels. Several attempts have been made before by inventors to produce the peculiarities of the harp-tone by means of a keyboard like that of the pianoforte attached to a harp, but not one has superseded the original instrument whose quality of sound was sought to be produced. Mr. Dietz has conquered this difficulty by the use of wire-strings covered with silk; the instrument is, therefore, no more likely to get out of tune than an ordinary pianoforte. The new instrument is a combination of the harp and the pianoforte.

It stands like the harp, as all the strings are exposed, and possesses a keyboard like the pianoforte. There are also two pedals, which not only augment the tone, but can be used to produce "harmonics"—an effect of great use in the harp. For orchestral purposes, as well as for solos, it will be most valuable. Any pianist can play it at once, while those who study its peculiarities will be able to produce an extraordinary variety of beautiful effects. The sound is produced, from the keyboard, by means of artificial "fingers," which pluck the strings, an ingenious mechanical arrangement causing them to leave the strings immediately their work is done, and to regain their places ready for further action. They act with the like rapidity of the hammers of a pianoforte, and enable the performer to produce every brilliant effect of which the harp is capable, and a great many more which the most expert player can only accomplish imperfectly, among which may be mentioned the chromatic scale, almost impossible upon the harp. The clavi-harp is light in structure, and can be easily carried from place to place. The shape and construction make it capable of receiving any amount of artistic decoration. It is distinctly a noteworthy invention, and one with a great future before it.

The character of the clavi-harp in various aspects was exhibited in some solos played at a private trial by Mdle. Drutz, of the Conservatoire of Brussels, a young artist who has studied the instrument and displays its qualifications in a charming style. Its value as an accompaniment to the voice was proved in the songs gracefully sung by Miss Ambler and Mr. W. H. Cummings, and a violin solo played by Mr. Burnett gave a capital idea of the beauty of the tone in combination with other instruments. It is proposed to arrange shortly a series of Recitals in London to make the clavi-harp better known.

MUSIC IN BIRMINGHAM.

SINCE the close of the Christmas holidays, which extended this time till nearly the end of January, there has been a general re-awakening here in the musical world, and events of interest have crowded rather closely upon one another for the past few weeks. Besides the several public performances noticed below, there have been weekly rehearsals of the newly formed Festival Choir (under Mr. Stockley's direction) since January 31. Handel's "Saul" and Dvorák's "Stabat Mater" were the works first taken in hand, and these will be followed in due course by Berlioz's Requiem and the new works by Dr. Hubert Parry, Mr. A. Goring Thomas, and Dr. Frederick Bridge.

The success of Messrs. Harrison's third Concert, on January 30, being preassured by a full subscription list, the caterers are entitled to some credit for the pains they were at to gratify their subscribers by the provision of an attractive musical menu and the engagement of a more than usually strong corps of executants. These included Madame Trebelli, Mdle. Antoinette Trebelli, Miss Alice Whitacre, Mr. Henry Piercy, Mr. Barrington Foote, and Mr. Edward Lloyd, vocalists; Mr. Josef Hollmann, solo violoncello; Mr. W. G. Halliley, solo organ; and Signor Bisaccia, solo pianoforte and Conductor. Instrumental music, as usual at these Concerts, was subordinate to the claims of song, but the violoncello playing of Mr. Hollmann was nevertheless a pleasing and prominent feature of the entertainment. The organ playing of Mr. Halliley in Batiste's Offertoire in G, and Signor Bisaccia's brilliant performance of Gottschalk's piquant "Pasquinade," are also entitled to a word of commendation.

The second Chamber Concert of the Birmingham Musical Guild, which took place at the Masonic Hall on the 2nd ult., was even more successful in a popular sense than the first, and the large audience present did not spare their applause, more particularly of the pianoforte and violin items. The performers were Mrs. Richardson, a local pianist who has lately come rapidly to the front; Herr H. Sück, a young Prussian violinist of considerable power, who made his first appearance in England on this occasion; Mr. T. E. Pountney, clarinet; Mr. W. Griffin, viola; Mr. Owen, violoncello; Mr. H. Partridge, vocalist; and Mr. T. Troman, accompanist. Of the concerted pieces, the most important were Mozart's Trio in E flat, for pianoforte, clarinet, and viola; Prout's melodious Quartet in F (Op. 18), for piano and strings; and Rubinstein's Sonata in G, for piano and violin, of which the Andante was omitted. Mrs. Richardson, who combines an admirable technique with rare musical intelligence and command of expression, delighted the audience greatly by her refined rendering of the Chopin Ballade in A flat (Op. 47), and was equally successful in the Rubinstein Sonata, which affords considerable scope for executive display. Mr. Pountney won great applause in the Romance and Polonaise from Weber's Clarinet Concerto (Op. 74), and the other performers generally acquitted themselves with credit and success.

The Festival Choral Society have been making strenuous efforts this season to retrieve their position and recover lost ground, but it is uphill work in these cheap times for a high-class musical organisation to compete against the host of semi-amateur choirs, which are exploiting the same field at popular prices, and the results thus far are not very promising for the older association. The third Concert of the current series, on the 9th ult., was an interesting and meritorious one, but it failed to attract an adequate audience. The programme comprised Dvorák's Cantata "The Spectre's Bride" and Dr. Villiers Stanford's "The Revenge." The former work, it may be remembered, was produced at the last Birmingham Festival, and Dr. Stanford's Choral Ballad, which was heard here for the first time on this occasion, was one of the novelties of the Leeds Festival of 1886. In Dvorák's weird and dramatic Cantata, the hapless Bride was impersonated by Madame Dotti, whilst Mr. Orlando Harley took the part of the Spectre, and Mr. Watkin Mills, at short notice, replaced Mr. Grice as the Narrator. The performance on the whole was very creditable, the choral music in particular being admirably rendered. Mr. Harley's vocal qualifications were at times severely taxed in the impassioned music of the Spectre, but in spite of these and a few other flaws, the performance was very spirited and praiseworthy, and appeared to give general satisfaction. The music is of an order that grows upon the hearer, and is the more appreciated the better it is known. Mr. Harley's most successful effort was in the melodious duet "Now when the night so fair doth show," and Mr. Watkin Mills was specially effective in the grim ballad "And at the door there came a knock." Dr. Stanford's fine nautical Cantata, so full of melody and breezy freshness, appeared to be even more to the taste of the audience than Dvorák's work, and was on the whole better rendered, the chorus again carrying off the palm. The playing of the band, however, left little to be desired, and much credit is due to the Conductor, Mr. Stockley, and to all concerned, for the admirable manner in which the composer's intentions were realised.

The musical Saturday evenings at the Town Hall continue to draw good audiences, and public patronage appears to be fairly divided between the Oratorio performances of the Midland Musical Society and the miscellaneous Concerts of Mr. A. W. Gilmer. Of the former series, perhaps the most noteworthy was the seventeenth Artizans' Concert, which took place on the 4th ult., when a really creditable performance of Handel's "Judas Macabæus" was given to a large and appreciative audience, under the direction of Mr. H. M. Stevenson. The vocal principals on this occasion were Miss Surgey, Mrs. Payton, Mr. R. L. James, and Mr. W. C. Chatwin. At Mr. Gilmer's Concerts, the seventh of which took place on the 18th ult., the band performances are always a prominent and attractive feature, though the claims of vocal music are not neglected. The band is apparently strong in solo talent, for which scope is found in numerous pieces and transcriptions for wind instruments.

The second Concert of the West Bromwich Choral Society, on the 7th ult., was signalled by the production of a new Cantata by a local composer, Miss Lizzie Hartland, daughter of the Society's Conductor, and for some years its accompanist. "Richard Cœur de Lion," as the Cantata is entitled, deals with a familiar lyric subject, to which additional familiarity is imparted by the interpolation of several verses from Mrs. Hemans' poem; but Miss Hartland's music, if not very striking on the score of originality, is nevertheless distinctly her own, and is characterised by considerable rhythmic charm, expressiveness, and knowledge of effect. Among the most successful numbers was a Farewell duet, the choruses "The Curfew chime" and "O lovely May"—the latter for female voices only—the melodious scena following it, and a tenor song, "Near thee." The work would benefit by compression, many of the numbers being unduly extended. The principal vocal parts were taken by Miss Fenna (in place of Mdle. Trebelli, indisposed), Mr. Harper Kearton, and Mr. Bridson, and the performance altogether was highly creditable.

In lieu of the formal annual Concert of former seasons, the Edgbaston Amateur Musical Union—a Society established for the cultivation of orchestral music—gave, on the 8th ult., an "open musical evening" or conversazione, at the Edgbaston Vestry Hall. The band numbered some fifty performers, with a fair sprinkling of ladies among the violins; a couple of local vocalists, Herr Sück as solo violin, and Mr. J. W. Cooke as Conductor. Haydn's Symphony in C (Op. 66), known as "The Bear," from the rustic dance theme of the Finale, was the pièce de résistance, and was, on the whole, very creditably played, though with but little of the brilliancy and finish which would be looked for from a professional band. The Overtures to Gounod's "Mirella" and Auber's "La Sirène," with the "Queen of Sheba" March from the former opera, were also very creditably given. Herr Sück confirmed the favourable impression produced by his violin playing at the Guild Concert a few nights previously, by his admirable performance of Max Bruch's somewhat ponderous Romance in A. The singing of Miss Edwards (contralto) and Mr. F. Cox (bass) was considerably above the amateur level both in style and vocal quality. Mr. J. W. Cooke had a more than usually onerous task as Conductor of an amateur band, but came through the ordeal very creditably.

The second of Madame Agnes Miller's Chamber Concerts, on the 16th ult., drew a large and high-class audience, the attendance in some parts of the hall being even larger than on the first occasion. As at the previous Concerts, the executants were all ladies, including, besides the bénéficiaire, who undertook the responsible duties of pianist, Miss Emily Shinner and Miss Lucy Riley (violins), Miss Cecilia Gates (viola), and Miss Florence Hemming (violoncello). The programme consisted of Schubert's fine String Quartet in A minor (Op. 22), Brahms's Pianoforte and String Quintet in F minor (Op. 34), Beethoven's Pianoforte Fantasia in G minor (Op. 77), Boccherini's Violoncello Sonata in A, a Study and Impromptu of Chopin, and three little Duets for violins, by B. Godard, the French composer who is now engaged on the score of "Ruy Blas." Madame Miller's playing was a remarkable exhibition of power and technique, alike in the Brahms's Quintet and the Beethoven Fantasia; but though she displayed a good deal of grace and fancy in the Chopin pieces, they were less obviously fitted to her style and acquirements. Miss Florence Hemming gave a charming rendering of the violoncello part in Boccherini's popular Sonata, and Miss Shinner, Miss Riley, and Miss Gates confirmed the favourable impressions produced by their previous performance here.

At the Mayor's reception, on the 14th ult., when some 1,300 of the local élite were entertained at the Council House, a pleasing feature of the entertainment was the Concert given in the Council Chamber, under Mr. Troman's direction, when the principal performers were Madame Florence Winn, Miss Ethel Winn, and Mr. Sackville West, vocalists; and Miss Donaldson, violinist.

MUSIC IN EDINBURGH.

The fourth and last of the series of Orchestral Concerts arranged by Messrs. Paterson took place on the evening of January 24. The programme was one of unusual interest, the second part consisting of Berlioz's "Symphonie Fantastique." Weber's "Freischütz" Overture, the "Invitation to the Waltz" (Weber-Berlioz), Wuerst's Serenade "Under the Balcony," and the Gavotte from "Mignon," formed the rest of the orchestral part. The vocalist was Madame Belle Cole, who sang an Aria by Mercadante, Schubert's "Adieu," and Salaman's "My Star." She was well received and heartily endorsed. At the end of the first part Mr. Paterson, the entrepreneur, came forward on the platform and explained to the audience the difficulties and risks he had had to encounter in financing the scheme which the Choral Union has been forced to abandon. These Concerts had, however, not only paid expenses but had left a small surplus, which would be carried on to the next season, when he proposed to arrange further Concerts. He expressed a regret that the smallness of the hall made it necessary to charge prices which prevented many from attending, and explained how easy a thing it would be to enlarge the hall by taking in the large Assembly Room, adding that plans had been drawn up by Dr. Rowand Anderson for the necessary alterations, and that he hoped the music-loving public would advocate the raising of the necessary funds. He concluded by proposing a vote of thanks to Mr. Manns, which the latter acknowledged, thanking the audience for their appreciation of his services and that of his orchestra.

On the afternoon of January 28 a Concert, under the auspices of the Burns Club, in aid of a fund to raise a memorial to Templeton, Wilson, and Kennedy (deceased exponents of Scottish song), took place in the Waterloo Hotel. The music was of a Scottish character, rendered by Madame Annie Grey and lady amateurs; Mr. Arthur Edmunds and Mr. McConnell Wood. Mr. Carl Hamilton (violin) and M. Jules Guitton (violin) contributed solos, and Mr. Bridgman accompanied.

On the evening of the same date the Edinburgh Choral Union, under the leadership of Mr. Collinson, gave Mendelssohn's "Hymn of Praise" and "Walpurgis Nacht," in the Music Hall. The soloists, with the exception of Mr. Iver McKay, were popular local artists. The orchestra was represented by a select band of local string players, aided by piano and organ.

A Chamber Concert was given on the evening of January 28, consisting of Schumann's Trio "Phantasiestücke" (Op. 88) and Raff's Trio in G (Op. 112). The performers were Mr. Colin Mackenzie (violin), Mr. Grant McNeill (violin), and Herr Otto Schweizer (piano), who replaced Mr. Townsend, unable to attend. Herr Schweizer gave as solos two Studies by Chopin, a Study by Litolf, and Liszt's transcription of Franz's song "Er ist gekommen." Mr. McNeill played Mendelssohn's Lied in D and F. Néruda's Mazurka in G minor. There was a large audience.

The annual Concert in aid of the funds of the Railway Guards' Friendly Society took place in the Music Hall on the evening of the 3rd ult. As usual, the programme was of a popular character. The artists were Madame Sinico, Mdlle. Sinico, Miss Emily Dones, Mr. Bantock Pierpoint (who replaced Signor Foli, who was unable to fulfil his engagement), and Mr. Sidney Tower. Miss Anna Lang contributed Handel's Sonata in A and Papini's Saltarello. This performance was repeated on the following afternoon, the proceeds to be given to the same Society.

An open meeting of the Edinburgh Society of Musicians was held on the evening of the 4th ult. Members of the Edinburgh Harmonist's Society sang glee and part-songs, and instrumental selections were given by Messrs. Daly, Carl Hamilton, Gallrein, Riddel, and Otto Schweizer. The President, Mr. Edmunds, thanked the Harmonists for the pleasure they had afforded the Society, and said that their Society (the Harmonists) was one of the oldest in Scotland, and that he had spent many a happy evening with them long ago.

On the same evening the Saturday Night People's Concert took place in the Synod Hall. Miss Romola Tynte varied the music with recitations, which were very well received. The hall was crowded, hundreds being unable to gain admission.

The Edinburgh Amateur Orchestral Society, under the leadership of Mr. Carl Hamilton, gave the second Concert for the season on the evening of the 7th ult. Beethoven's "Leonora," a Concerto of Mozart, a Symphony of Haydn, Overtures by Reissiger and Suppé, a "Spring Melody," by Grieg, a "Wedding March," by Soderman, and songs, completed the programme. The piano part of the Concerto was played by Mr. McEwen in a very praiseworthy style.

On the evening of the 8th, in aid of church expenses, a Recital of Sacred Music was given in St. Vincent's Church. Mr. Arthur Edmunds sang Stainer's air "My hope is in the everlasting," and, with the lady vocalist, the duet, "Love Divine, all love excelling," by the same composer. The rest of the Recital was chiefly hymns and anthems.

The annual Reid Festival consisted of three Concerts, the first of which took place on Saturday afternoon, the 11th ult. Sir Herbert Oakeley, the Professor of Music, engaged, as usual, Mr. Hallé and his orchestra, and, as soloists, besides

Mr. Hallé, Madame Norman-Néruda, Madame Nordica, and Mr. Watkin Mills. The Concert opened with Spontini's Overture "Vestale," followed by Beethoven's great Violin Concerto, rendered by Madame Néruda, needless to say, in perfection; Haydn's Symphony in D minor, Sterndale Bennett's Overture "The Wood-Nymphs," Mendelssohn's "Midsummer Night's Dream," Schubert's "Rosamunde," and Wagner's "Kaiser" March. Mr. Hallé gave as solos Chopin's Prelude in A (Op. 23) and Grande Polonaise (Op. 44). Madame Nordica sang "Il soave e bel contento," by Pacini, and "Gli angui d' inferno," from "Il Flauto Magico"; and Mr. Watkin Mills sang an Aria by Handel, and "O tu Palermo," from "I vespri Siciliani." Both vocalists were thoroughly appreciated.

The Reid Concert proper took place on Monday night, the 13th ult. It opened with the performance of a March, composed by General Reid, played yearly at this Concert in compliment to his memory. Cherubini's "Anacreon" Overture, Weber's Concerto in F minor, and Beethoven's No. 3 Symphony ("Eroica") formed the first part. Mendelssohn's "Hebrides" Overture, Minuet and Trio, by Boccherini, and "Lustspiel," by Smetana, followed. Madame Norman-Néruda's solos were Beethoven's Romance in F and Paganini's "Mouvement Perpetuel." She was enthusiastically cheered and recalled. Madame Nordica again charmed her audience by her rendering of "Let the bright Seraphim," from "Samson," and "Una voce poco fa," from "Il Barbiere," the latter part of which she repeated in answer to an enthusiastic recall. Mr. Watkin Mills sang an air from Gounod's "Irene," and two songs composed by Sir Herbert Oakeley, "For ever and for ever" and "The Troubadour's Song." This last-named so pleased the audience that it had to be repeated.

On the following evening a Chamber Concert was given, the success of which need not be mentioned when it is said that the performers were Madame Norman-Néruda, Mr. Charles Hallé, Messrs. Strauss, Vieuxtemps, L. Hoffmann, G. Hoffmann, Lalande, and Paersch. Schumann's grand Quintet in E flat was first played. Madame Néruda and Mr. Hallé gave a Bach Sonata for violin and piano. Madame Néruda's solos were a Barcarole and Scherzo by Spohr, and Mr. Hallé's Mendelssohn's Caprice Brilliant and Prelude and Fugue in E minor. Beethoven's Grand Septuor completed the Concert, a fitting close to a musical treat, the value of which, both from an æsthetic and an educational point of view, cannot be overrated. After the Concert, Mr. Hallé was entertained at supper by the Edinburgh Society of Musicians. After the usual toasts, Professor Sir Herbert Oakeley, as a member, proposed, in the name of the Society, to make Mr. Hallé an honorary member. Mr. Hallé, in a graceful little speech, accepted the membership. Mr. Lichtenstein, in the absence of the President, occupied the chair.

On the same evening Professor Veitch, of Glasgow University, delivered a Lecture on Border Song to the members of the Philosophical Institution. Madame Annie Grey sang in illustration several Scottish songs, chiefly border ballads, which were much applauded. Mr. Bridgman accompanied.

Mr. Paul Della Torre, a promising and talented young pianist, gave a Pianoforte Recital in the Literary Institute on the evening of the 16th ult. He played Weber's Sonata in A flat, selections from Chopin, Jensen, and Moszkowski, and two improvisations by Zarembki.

MUSIC IN GLASGOW AND THE WEST OF SCOTLAND.

THE present season of Choral and Orchestral Concerts, under the management of the Glasgow Choral Union, came to a close on the 4th ult. The chief instrumental works performed between that date and the last Concert referred to in our last issue were Schumann's "Genoveva" Overture, the Serenade of the Ishmaelites from "The Childhood of Christ," by Berlioz; Haydn's No. 10 Symphony, Beethoven's C minor Symphony, and selections from Wagner. On Thursday evening, the 2nd ult., Berlioz's "Faust" was produced, with Miss Mary Dajies and Messrs. McKay, Grice, and King in the solo parts, an augmented orchestra, and the full strength of the chorus. Under the direction of Mr. Joseph Bradley, this important work was presented in the most satisfactory manner. Mr. Bradley evidently showed an intimate acquaintance with the score, and a complete command of both chorus and orchestra. The last Concert of the season was made up of orchestral works receiving the highest number of votes at the plebiscites taken at the two previous meetings. The result of the voting at this time was hardly an improvement on the exercise of "Suffrage universel" in former years. The principal favourite selections were again the Overture to "William Tell," Beethoven's Pastoral Symphony, and the Overture to "Tannhäuser," just as heretofore, with one or two minor varieties included in the exercise of the discretion of the programme committee. In compliment to the composer, as well as in acknowledgment of the genuine merits of the music, Mr. Hamish MacCunn's Concert-Overture "The Land of the Mountain and the Flood" was included in the programme.

After the performance of "Faust," on the night of the 4th ult., the members of the Union held their annual Conversation and ball. Mr. James Campbell, of Tullichewan, honorary president of the Choral Union, occupied the chair, a number of ladies and gentlemen who take an interest in the scheme accompanying him to the platform. In course of a few congratulatory remarks, Mr. Campbell intimated that he believed there would be a deficit in the present series of Concerts, though it was not expected to be a serious one. He was certain, however, that the guarantors would meet the deficiency ungrudgingly, and he saw no reason in the world why the Concerts should not be resumed in faith and hope next season. The chief cause of the deficit arose from the decreased amount of the subscriptions, though this was in a large measure made up by the support of the non-subscribing public.

The Choral Union have, after a fortnight's rest, taken up Beethoven's "Engedi" ("Mount of Olives"), pending future arrangements, as also some of the music they are to sing at the opening of, or during the course of, the Glasgow International Exhibition.

A performance of Mr. T. Mee Pattison's setting of Coleridge's "Ancient Mariner" was given by the choir of Ibrox United Presbyterian Church, on the evening of the 9th ult. The annual competition for the gold medal awarded by the Directors of the Saturday Evening City Hall Concerts for the best singing took place on the 11th ult. The singing of all the competitors was of a high order. Dr. Hiles's Cantata "The Crusaders" was included in the programme of a Concert given on the 16th ult. by the Choir of Kilmalcolm Established Church, the performances being under the direction of Mr. J. C. Fyfe, Organist of the Church, who is about to sail for California. At Motherwell, in Lanarkshire, a performance was given of Handel's "Messiah" by the Choral Union of that industrious locality. Mr. John Marshall conducted. The Wishaw orchestra played the accompaniments. Mendelssohn's "Elijah" was performed on the 9th ult. by the Helensburgh Choral Union, in a creditable manner, under Mr. T. Brash, as Conductor. The accompaniments were played by Mr. Cole's orchestra.

The Glasgow Corporation Saturday Afternoon Musical Recitals, admission to which is threepence and one penny, including programmes, have been largely attended during the past month, and apparently by the classes for whose benefit they have been undertaken. Several of the city choirs, as well as some of our skilled amateurs, have taken part in furnishing the musical entertainment. Organ solos are sometimes played by Mr. H. A. Lambeth, who also, by his skill, makes the City Hall organ tolerable, though at the best it is but a poor instrument.

A performance of Gounod's great work "The Redemption" was given by the Greenock Choral Union in the Town Hall on the 3rd ult. The chorus of the newly-organised Society sang with remarkable correctness, as well as with firmness and good taste. The principals were Mr. W. Nicholl and Mr. Robert Grice, Mrs. Osborne Williams and Mrs. Paterson Cross. The orchestral accompaniments were played by the band of the Glasgow Choral Union in conjunction with the organ. Mr. W. T. Hoeck conducted, and the performance was one of marked general excellence.

Sterndale Bennett's "Woman of Samaria" was performed by the Choir of Caledonia Road United Presbyterian Church on the 21st ult., Mr. Kerr, Organist of the Church, conducting, and Mr. Eadie accompanying on the organ. The solo parts were taken by local professionals. On the same date the newly-formed St. Cecilia Choral Society gave its initiatory Concert in the Queen's Rooms, the programme consisting chiefly of part-songs and choruses. Mr. McNabb conducted.

MUSIC IN LIVERPOOL.

CAN it be that music here is at a discount; that we are slipping backwards; that the public has become really unappreciative; or is it that music, like many other arts, goes in cycles, and that we are at present suffering under the ban of a temporary depression in the musical barometer? Certain it is that we are not advancing, and, on returning home after a long enforced absence, one cannot help feeling keenly this melancholy fact. There is something wrong in our musical constitution; the mechanism is cumbersome and illogical, and the effect is disappointing. First and foremost is the prominent feature that we have practically all our classical concerts under the direction of the same musician. Even if such a principle happened to be successful for a time, it can never be advocated as reasonable or judicious, and although Mr. Charles Hallé's name is beyond comment—much less criticism—we must face the fact that for several years Liverpool has been labouring under the effects of a grievous mistake. In music, as in everything else, do away with competition—healthy, legitimate competition, constantly keeping in view a high artistic standard—and it soon becomes stunted, effete, and objectless. This is what we have come to in Liverpool. For four years Mr. Hallé has not only held his own Concerts, but has acted as Conductor of the Philharmonic Society. It is now evident that from financial reasons alone he must abandon either one or the other, and it is a pity for Liverpool that this drastic remedy for a palpable mistake has been so long in coming about.

Is it surprising, therefore, that the public whose enthusiasm has thus been damped should fall away? It is true that efforts have been made to stimulate musical energies—the Philharmonic Choral Society performed a good work to this end, although its career was so brief. But this fleeting success has ever been the fate of such societies, and, dependent entirely upon the sympathy and appreciation of the public, without any established or real financial basis or permanent clientèle to stand the test of hard times, it is no wonder that they should sooner or later collapse. The Philharmonic Choral Society at least did something to stem the ebbing tide, but the apathy of the public proved dominant and contributed to its own loss.

On the other hand, the lyric art seems to grow and flourish. Perhaps this may be due specially to Mr. Carl Rosa, but at any rate there is no doubt that every visit he pays to Liverpool is longer and more prosperous than its predecessor. His present season has, as usual, been signalled by a "first production in English," the opera this time being "Robert the Devil," and the inevitable success attending Mr. Rosa's "first productions" has been again verified. It is now out of date to comment on the gorgeous orchestration of Meyerbeer's work, which is nothing if not fanciful, but lacks the depth and genius of its greater compeer, "The Huguenots." It was a new revelation, however, to see the opera produced with such an elaboration of stage scenery and effects as quite eclipsed Mr. Rosa's previous undertakings, and as a spectacle alone "Robert the Devil" will live in the Company's répertoire. Madame Georgina Burns and Miss Fanny Moody enhanced their reputation by their share in this first performance, which took place on the 8th ult.

Mr. Charles Hallé's sixth Concert, which was given in the Philharmonic Hall on January 31, was notable for a series of unfortunate contretemps, and as Mr. Lloyd was to have been the solo vocalist, his absence through indisposition was the most marked, notwithstanding that this was explained away by Mr. Hallé in a felicitous little speech. Although the programme was composed of solid items there was little novelty in any of the pieces, and as regards production it was a thorough Hallé Concert undiluted, the chief item being Mr. Hallé's rendering of Beethoven's G major Pianoforte Concerto, and, under his direction, Berlioz's weird—almost ghastly—Symphonie Fantastique in C.

At the Philharmonic Society's Concert, on the 7th ult., Miss Fanny Davies played, in a very artistic manner, the same Beethoven Concerto. The Symphony was Mozart in C major, and the work given the greatest prominence was C. H. Lloyd's Cantata "Hero and Leander." In this the principals, Mrs. Hutchinson and Mr. Bantock Pierpoint, upheld their reputation, and the chorus sang carefully.

At his seventh and last but one Concert, on the 21st ult., Mr. Hallé gave another Concerto of Beethoven's—the well-known "Emperor"—his reading being characterised by thorough conscientiousness and unerring precision. Mr. Hallé's other pianoforte contribution was Liszt's "Rhapsodie Hongroise" in E (No. 1). The only real novelty of this performance was Dvorák's Symphony in D minor, a work which is quite in keeping with the composer's established style and originality. It contains several themes of high merit, and in its theoretical construction the workmanship of the artist is pre-eminent. In this and the other orchestral items, which included the dainty Mozart Romanza for strings so much appreciated at the previous Concert, the band quite justified their reputation. Mr. Santley was the vocalist, giving examples of Wagner and Gounod.

The Birkenhead Subscription Concerts continue to do good artistic work, and the last of the present series, held in the Music Hall on the 7th ult., was eminently satisfactory. Mr. Schiever's String Quartet played an Andante of Schubert's, and Miss Fanny Davies gave a Prelude and Fugue of Mendelssohn's with true executive ability. Madame Osborne Williams was the vocalist.

The Liverpool Choral Society commenced active operations on the 3rd ult., with a performance of the "Creation" in the Rotunda Hall. Under the direction of Mr. Hughes the chorus gave an excellent rendering of the more massive numbers, whilst the solo work was in the capable hands of Miss Laura Howarth, Mr. Seymour Jackson, and Mr. Edward Grime.

MUSIC IN MANCHESTER.

OUR musical season is rapidly tending toward its close. Mr. de Jong's ten Concerts have been duly given, and on the 8th inst. Mr. Hallé will finish his longer series. I fear that, as a whole, it has not been a profitable time; for at no performances during the winter have the attendances equalled expectation. The reason has not yet been clearly shown. The long and dry summer has been blamed for many disappointments and disasters; while some think that the allurements of the late Exhibition not only attracted all the spare money of pleasure seekers, but left all of us with renewed zest for fireside ease and domestic quietude; and it is possible that the oft-hailed brighter aspects of business have not yet reached and enlivened the great mass of music-lovers amongst us. But certain it is that our concert-givers have not been so prosperous as of yore. The Gentlemen's Concerts have not been the only undertakings which, during this passing winter, have languished. Indeed, the Concert Hall was rather fuller—or less empty—than usual at the Concert (January 30) immediately following the conversazione whereat the necessities of the institution were explained. There was no novelty in the programme—novelties seldom reach us here—and Sterndale Bennett's "Wood-Nymph" Overture was the most genuinely poetic item.

At the Free Trade Hall, after the repetition of that nightmare lucubration of Berlioz, which he called an "Episode de la Vie d'un Artiste," we regained health and sanity by listening to "The Golden Legend," as interpreted by the Misses Marriott and Hope Glenn, and Messrs. Lloyd, Barrow, and Watkin Mills. Whatever may be the precise esteem which Sullivan's, as yet, highest work may gain in the future, there is no doubt of the freshness and spontaneity of its conception, of the masterly character of its graphic orchestration, or of the skill with which the composer—while traversing oft-trodden ground—has succeeded in striking out a definite and consistent path for himself, having a clearness of purpose undimmed by the faintest shadow of those previously attracted by any of the many versions of the Mephistophelian legend. Dvorák's Symphony in D minor (Op. 7) was, on the 9th ult., received with that respect with which every musician listens to the Bohemian composer, and with a desire to realise its inner meaning. Doubtless the conception will be more fully grasped as familiarity with its embodiment increases; but we have not yet quite got beyond that deterrent influence which, until peculiarities of utterance are surmounted, inevitably veils and obscures an author's meaning. The true development of any school of art must be on lines consistent with, and forming the natural expression of, race-temperament; but there may be a danger of idiosyncrasy being coddled and cherished until the colouring of a picture hides, rather than unfolds, the thought which should underlie and shine through it.

With the author's own version of the Concerto in D, Mr. Hallé completed the series of Beethoven's great pianoforte works. But long acquaintance with the Op. 61, as rendered by all the great violinists, precluded, in spite of the player's skill, absolute enjoyment of its altered form. Pianists must be content with their own, not scanty, domain, and leave to the artists of the graceful bow the few works of highest class to which they have an indefeasible claim. Instead of the Concerto in D of Brahms, which Herr Joachim played here for the second time on the 16th ult.—an impressive, rather than interesting, work—we would willingly have listened to a repetition of such an interpretation of Beethoven's great work as he gave some years ago, the memory of which has dwelt in many minds as a delight never to be forgotten.

The Athenæum Musical Society, on the 13th ult., brought forward Bottesini's "Garden of Olivet," written for the last Norwich Festival. Of course the resources of an essentially vocal society did not permit an orchestral rendering of the accompaniments; but the Director, Dr. Hiles, rightly judged that the merit of the work lies chiefly in its charmingly melodious character, and that it demands from its executants such qualifications as his singers fully possess. Four solo voices are furnished with music of a kind very grateful to its interpreters. Of the choruses we must especially mention the first, "Though the Lord give thee"; the last, "Him hath God exalted"; and the grand chorus, "Dear Lord," in which the composer rises to a loftier height than he elsewhere reaches. The Society is to be commended for grappling with and for so worthily presenting it, so far as the means at disposal allowed.

In the present dearth of vocal ability of highest class, and the costliness of talent of the second range, there has been a commendable turning of the attention of Concert-givers to the resources found in, or originally belonging to, this neighbourhood; and several young aspirants have—some of them rather prematurely—obtained a hearing. The fact (to which I have repeatedly called attention) has, at length, been recognised, that Lancashire and Yorkshire are rich in voices, in artistic capacity, and in musical instinct and enthusiasm; and it is earnestly to be hoped that every encouragement may be afforded for the development of those qualifications. But a fatal mistake will be made if—as so often happens—promising young students are lured away from steady labour by injudicious applause. In the present day, and fully as much here as elsewhere, there is an eagerness to escape the drudgery of rudimentary work, a desire to come before the public and be talked about, and a greediness to be getting money before it may be quite fairly earned, which, if fostered, will do more harm than all our increased facilities for culture may do good. By all means let us push on young talent, particularly in that really kindest of all ways—by urging on its highest development, and by insisting upon that perseverance and patience in its expansion which alone may lead to real excellence. It is painful to think of all the promise that, within the last few years, has come to nought, because of the indiscriminate praise of friendly critics and a kindly public. I forbear from mentioning names of several pupils—really, as yet, nothing more—who this season have visited us, because I hope ere long to have an opportunity of quoting them with honest applause.

One thing I again thankfully record. During the season, now so nearly over, our orchestral resources have materially increased. At those Concerts where the expenses of a band may be grappled with there has been a manifest improvement, both in the provision and in discipline. Mr. Hallé's strings may be specially extolled as resonant, brilliant, and of vigorous attack; while the general balance of his orchestra is—when the noisier brass instruments are restrained—commendable. Mr. de Jong may be congratulated warmly upon the purity of tone and finish of his wood-wind. At his last Concert the interest of the audience was excited fully as much by the performance of the band in the lighter pieces as by any of the vocal morceaux, although the new tenor (as he was rather grandiloquently termed) Mr. C. Banks is the happy possessor of a voice of admirably clear and rich tone, and was fortunate in his early trainer.

MUSIC IN SOUTH WALES.

(FROM OUR OWN CORRESPONDENT.)

THE Cardiff Orchestral Society's Concert, on the 1st ult., at the Park Hall, Cardiff—the last of a series of three—attracted an exceptional amount of attention. The Conductor was Mr. S. G. Fifoot, and the performance gave great satisfaction. Mr. Pierpoint took the place of Signor Foli. Miss Hilda Wilson also sang on this occasion. Mr. Frank Lambert (violinist), being unwell, did not take his allotted part, and his substitute was Mr. W. H. Squire, Swansea. Mr. J. E. Deacon played the pianoforte accompaniments.

On the 15th ult. a Concert was given by Madame Trebelli and party at the Park Hall, Cardiff. Miss Bertha Moore sang instead of Miss Alice Whitacre.

At the Colonial Hall, Cardiff, the Catholic Choral Union have rendered Haydn's Mass (No. 2) and some miscellaneous selections. The orchestra was led by Mr. Banes. Sunday night Concerts of sacred music are now being given in the same building.

On the 8th ult. the fifth of a series of Chamber Music Concerts took place at the lesser Park Hall, Cardiff, and was of a successful character. Mr. Josef Ludwig was violinist, Mr. W. E. Whitehouse, violoncellist, and Mr. T. E. Aylward, accompanist.

The Dedication Festival at Brynmawr Parish Church was kept from the 2nd ult. to the 9th ult. The Beaufort String Band, led by Mr. H. Chapman, assisted in the musical service on the 9th ult. The Organist on this occasion was the Rev. J. H. Jones, Curate, and the Conductor, Mr. Tong.

The Hirwain Selected Choir gave a performance of Root's Cantata "The Haymakers," at Nebò Chapel, Hirwain, on the 8th ult. Vocalists from various parts of the district rendered assistance.

Another interesting Concert was given at the Institute, Mountain Ash, on the 14th ult. The Vicar (Rev. B. Lloyd) presided. Miss Jessie Coleman sang several solos. Assistance was also rendered by the Hon. Miss C. L. Bruce, Miss Callaway, Miss Colston, Miss K. Thomas, Mr. Tong, and others. An excellent Concert was also given at the Workmen's Hall, Mountain Ash, in the early part of last month, in aid of the English Wesleyan Church. Mr. Green, Cwmpennar, presided. Among the vocalists were Miss M. Jones, Miss Jessie Coleman, Mr. John Williams, Mr. Brennan, Mr. W. Thomas, Mr. J. Griffiths, and Mr. J. Daniels. Pianist, Miss Callaway. Mr. J. Bishop conducted the string band. A Concert has been held in the same town in aid of the Widows' and Orphans' Fund of the Great Western Railway Servants. The programme was interesting, and well performed by the Hon. Miss P. G. Bruce, Miss Coleman, Mr. Angle, Cardiff, and others.

An effort will be made at Merthyr to hold an Eisteddfod in the locality during the year.

The question of appointing a successor to Mr. Templeton, Professor of Music at the University College, Cardiff, has occasioned much local criticism. The following resolution was passed on the subject at a meeting, on the 10th ult., of the Cardiff Cymmrodorion (Major Jones presiding): "That we have noticed with great satisfaction the decision of the Council of the University College of South Wales and Monmouthshire to continue the Musical Lectureship.

That we deeply regret a subsequent tendency to make the resolution of the Council inoperative, and should strongly deprecate any action which prevented the continuance of the chair of music as tending to alienate the sympathies of the Welsh people from an institution which should be national in the fullest sense of the word."

On the 9th ult. the Aberdare Orchestral Society gave a successful Concert at the Temperance Hall in that town. The chief vocalists were Madame Naunton Morgan and Eos Morlais. The instrumentalists included Mr. T. Carington (violinist) and Mr. C. Watts (oboe).

MUSIC IN THE WEST.

THE last of the series of four classical Chamber Concerts given by Mrs. Viner-Pomeroy during the season, took place on the 8th ult., at the Victoria Rooms, when we were glad to notice a much larger attendance than usual. The executants were Mr. Henry Holmes (violin), Mr. Ellis Roberts (viola), Mr. J. Pomeroy (violin), Mr. J. Reynolds (contra-bass), and Mrs. Viner-Pomeroy (pianoforte). The programme consisted of three items—Mozart's Quartet in G minor, for piano, violin, viola, and violoncello; Brahms's fine Sonata in A, for piano and violin, which was by far the most interesting feature of the evening; and Schubert's Quintet in A major. Many of us were looking forward with pleasure to hearing Handel's Trio in G minor, for violin, violoncello, and contra-bass, but owing to a misunderstanding it was omitted, and there was no time to substitute another work.

The announcement of the annual "Ladies' Night" of the Orpheus Glee Society drew as large an audience as ever to the Colston Hall on the 9th ult. The singing was even better than usual, though the choice of programme was not quite so happy as it has often been, and one or two of the numbers showed hardly sufficient merit to justify their place in the scheme. A new feature was introduced this year in the shape of two pieces with treble solo, the Dean and Chapter of the Cathedral having kindly consented that one of the choristers, who possesses an exceptionally beautiful voice, should sing on this occasion. Thus the Society were enabled to present Hiller's "O world, thou art wondrous fair," and "Home, sweet home," arranged for treble solo and five parts, in a most delightful manner. Mr. Harper Kearton took the tenor solos in "The image of the rose," "Thinking of home," and "I wish to tune," and performed his part admirably, and Mr. Dyer, of Bristol, was fairly successful in the bass solos in "Cold is Cadwallo's tongue" and "Love and wine," in which last the chorus acquitted themselves especially well, and with a word of special admiration for the singing of "Father of heroes," "Come, bounteous May," and "No more the morn," we must close our remarks by offering hearty congratulations to both the choir and their clever Conductor, Mr. George Riseley.

Mr. Augustus Simmons gave his annual Concert in Colston Hall, on the 11th ult., when the band of the Royal Marines was engaged, and the Bristol Musical Association gave their fifty-third Concert in the same building on the 18th ult., when a miscellaneous programme was performed. Miss Hannah Jones and Mr. Lawford Huxtable were the vocalists.

A very successful Concert was given by the Cheltenham Choral Society, under the direction of Mr. J. A. Matthews, on the 14th ult., when Cowen's Cantata "Sleeping Beauty" received an admirable rendering. The choruses had been thoroughly studied, and the choir showed great intelligence and spirit in their singing. A little more delicacy and refinement of expression will doubtless come with time. The work of the orchestra, with one or two exceptions, was good. Madame Trebelli, Miss Bertha Moore (who appeared in place of Miss Whitacre, who was ill), and Messrs. Piercy and Foote were the principal vocalists. These artists, with Herr Hollmann and Signor Bisaccia, all left Maidstone by an early morning train, but were snowed up on the way, and did not reach Cheltenham until after the hour for which the Concert was announced. They were greeted with immense enthusiasm on their appearance on the platform, and having been unable to bring on their evening costumes they sang in their travelling dresses, and their performance exhibited no trace of the exhaustion one would look for after fifteen hours' travelling.

Mr. Augustus Aylward gave two grand Concerts in Salisbury last month, one being given by Her Majesty's Opera Company, on the 6th ult., and the other a grand Pianoforte Recital by M. Vladimir de Pachmann, on the 18th ult. The Sarum Choral Society are preparing "Jephthah" for their Easter Concert.

On the 14th ult. a Concert was given by the Weymouth Musical Society, at the Burdon Hotel, Weymouth, before a numerous and fashionable audience. The artists engaged were Mrs. Cecil Newling, of Bournemouth, and the Salisbury Cathedral Quartet—Messrs. J. A. Pitman, W. Howgate, A. Crick, and C. Kelsey. The glees sung by these gentlemen were much applauded, and in two instances were encored, and they were also successful in their solos and vocal duets. Encores were awarded to Mrs. Newling, and to Messrs. Alcock and Thorne, who contributed a duet of Goltermann's for violoncello and piano. Mr. Thorne also proved himself fully equal to the post of accompanist throughout the Concert.

MUSIC IN YORKSHIRE.

THERE has been a considerable revival of musical interest during the past month, and amid the general all-round activity there have been one or two events of some importance. One was the revival of Macfarren's Oratorio "St. John the Baptist," by the Leeds Philharmonic Society, at their second ordinary Concert, which took place on the 1st ult., on which occasion were also produced Dr. Villiers Stanford's Choral Ballad "The Revenge," and Sir Arthur Sullivan's "Overture di Ballo." The Oratorio constituted one of the Festival items of 1874, and three years later was given by the Philharmonic Society, but until now had not since been heard in Leeds. The work was thus fresh both to audience and performers. No better opportunity of judging the merits of the music could have been wished. The dramatic aspect of the Oratorio was strongly accentuated. The chorus and band were admirably balanced, and the singing throughout was distinguished for firmness of intonation and precision of attack. The cleverly-designed fugal numbers were most commendably given, and one of the best features of the performance was the rendering of the chorus for females, "This is my beloved Son." The exacting part of the Prophet was undertaken by Mr. Bridson, whose manly, vigorous voice was heard with fine effect in the interjectional passages, but more especially in the important songs which are allotted to the part. Mr. Iver McKay sang the music written for Herod with pleasing effect, his best effort being the rendering of "Whatsoever mine eyes desire." The part of Salome was sustained by Madame Albu, who, in the difficult song "I rejoice in my youth," displayed great culture and a voice of much purity and firmness. Mrs. Alfred Broughton is to be commended for the warmth of feeling with which she invested the unattractive recitatives of the Narrator, as also for her effective singing of the air "In the beginning." The bright and graceful music of Sir Arthur Sullivan proved very refreshing, and was so admirably given that the audience grew enthusiastic. Dr. Stanford's Choral Ballad has grown familiar to Yorkshire audiences as well as to Yorkshire singers, and the production on this occasion was not less successful than any which had been undertaken previously. Its popularity seems assured and permanent. The performance was conducted by Mr. Alfred Broughton. Dr. Liddle presided at the organ. The Coliseum, in which the Concert took place, was well filled.

At Mr. Rawlinson Ford's Concert, on the 8th ult., a fine programme of orchestral music was presented by Mr. Charles Hallé's band. One of the works selected was the "Chevy Chase" Overture, by Sir George Macfarren, wherein are displayed not only the characteristic learning of the composer, but much more genial attributes, such as warmth of feeling, picturesqueness, and a delightful flow of melody. The feature of the evening, however, was Beethoven's Pastoral Symphony, which, though familiar to most musicians, had the quality of freshness at Leeds where, save through the medium of Mr. Ford's enterprise, orchestral concerts of the superior order are rare. The band entered into the varying phases of the work with zest, and the Symphony was listened to with unqualified delight. The "Lustspiel" Overture, which Mr. Hallé has introduced somewhat freely in recent programmes, was again heard, and the remainder of the orchestral pieces were the Overture to "Semiramide" and a movement from an Italian Suite, by Raffi. Apart from the enjoyment derivable from Mr. Hallé's band, the audience had an exceptional feast in the performances of Herr Schönberger, who made his début as pianist in Schumann's A minor Concerto (Op. 54) with the band, and gave solos by Jensen and Moszkowski. His reception was flattering and was thoroughly deserved. In everything which he undertook Herr Schönberger showed remarkable technical skill and keen intellectual faculty. Mr. Charles Chilley again sang with much acceptance, although apparently suffering from slight hoarseness.

A young Danish musician, Herr Christensen, to whose merits but scant justice has been meted out, has recently demonstrated his capability by the production of an attractive dramatic Cantata called "The Discontented Maidens." The work is in two parts and the music is entirely for female voices. The subject, of which the title is sufficiently indicative, has been put into literary form by Mr. William Tirebuck, who occasionally lapses into prosaic thoughts, which do not assimilate very successfully with the refined and graceful music wedded to them. The solos and choruses alike are fresh and attractive, and there is throughout a very commendable musicianly quality. Herr Christensen, himself a capable instrumentalist, has, above all, succeeded in investing the accompaniments with interest far beyond that which attaches to the ordinary methods of treatment. A performance of the work took place in the Albert Hall, Leeds, on the 11th ult. The principals were Miss Fanny Sellars, Miss Marie Lummert, Miss Norton, and Miss Tomlinson. Herr Christensen conducted his work. Mr. W. Booth was at the piano and Mr. Alfred Benton at the harmonium.

Mr. Charles Hallé and Madame Norman-Néruda, with the assistance of Miss Clara Leighton as vocalist, were responsible for the carrying out of the Subscription Concert, the tenth of the series, given at the Huddersfield Town Hall, on the 1st ult. Two of Beethoven's Sonatas, the Pastoral and the "Kreutzer," figured on the programme along with other works, such as Mozart's Andante in D minor, three of Chopin's works, and compositions by Vieuxtemps, Spohr, and Paganini for the violin. Miss Leighton's contributions, which were vigorously applauded, comprised songs by Coenen and Spohr, and a selection from "Oberon." Mr. J. E. Ibeson was the accompanist.

M. de Pachmann at the following Concert, on the 14th ult., displayed the same perfect command over the pianoforte as that which so delighted his audience on his first visit to Huddersfield. His admirable power of execution and exquisite delicacy of touch were both displayed with consummate skill in the several items, the varied effects being introduced in the most artistic and musicianly manner possible. The vocalist was Miss Alice Gomez, who, although a stranger to the Huddersfield audience, soon established herself as a favourite, and an early return visit from her would, there is no doubt, be heartily welcomed by the subscribers to this popular series of Concerts. Mr. J. E. Ibeson again displayed ability and judicious taste in his accompaniment of the vocal solos.

The programme of the fifth Bradford Subscription Concert, given on January 27, was of less importance than usual in a musical sense, being chiefly confined to ballads of the popular type, and the only feature of note was the genuine skill brought to bear in the rendering of them. The vocalists were Mrs. Henschel, Miss Hope Glenn, Mr. Edward Lloyd, and Mr. George Henschel. In addition to the vocalists, M. de Pachmann, who would have been a host in himself, gave solos. His best effort was Liszt's Polonaise in E, in the rendering of which he brought to bear his well-known skill. Other compositions by Raff, Weber, Henselt, and Chopin were equally well handled. Mr. S. Midgley and Mr. J. H. Clough officiated as accompanists to two of the vocalists. Mr. Henschel played his own accompaniments and those of the songs of Mrs. Henschel.

The sixth Concert, given on the 17th ult., was, on the other hand, of special interest, and the hall was more than usually well filled. The Concert opened with Beethoven's "Festival" Overture (which has been found to have been part of a work composed for the opening of the Josephstadt Theatre in Vienna, including music for chorus and solo voices shortly to be produced by the Bach Society), which was followed by Mendelssohn's unaccompanied Psalm "Judge me, O God," and "Reformation" Symphony, and Verdi's Requiem. The latter had an exceedingly fine effect. The performance was refined and careful, and the magnificent double chorus of the Sanctus, and the "Libera me" were particularly impressive. Miss Annie Marriott, Madame de Fonblanque, Mr. Lloyd, and Mr. Gilbert Campbell were the principals. Mendelssohn's Psalm was rendered with equal skill by the chorus, which was that of the Festival Choral Society, under the leadership of Dr. Joseph Bridge, the Conductor. The orchestral performances by Mr. Hallé's band were characterised by their usual efficiency. Mr. Hallé was at the Conductor's desk.

OBITUARY.

HENRY JOHN PARRY.—We have to announce the decease, at the age of sixty-three, of Mr. Henry John Parry, late a member of the well-known firm of music publishers, Messrs. Ashdown and Parry. The house was first established by Wessel, more than sixty years ago, and it secured renown by introducing much of the music of Liszt, Chopin, Stephen Heller, Kullak, and others. Wessel retired in 1860, and transferred his business to Messrs. Ashdown and Parry, who had been apprenticed to him, and had long been his managers. The new firm brought out a vast quantity of educational and other works. Mr. Parry retired about six years since, leaving Mr. Edwin Ashdown as sole proprietor of the business.

CARLO COSTA.—The death at Naples, at the age of sixty-two, is announced of Signor Carlo Costa, half-brother (by the father's side) of the late Sir Michael Costa. Carlo Costa studied under Mercadante, and became a successful teacher of harmony and composition, among his most celebrated pupils being the well known song writers Signor Tosti and Signor Caracciolo. Of late years Carlo Costa directed a harmony class for ladies at the Naples Conservatoire.

THE half-yearly general meeting of the Crystal Palace Company was held at the City Terminus Hotel on the 9th ult. Major A. G. Dickson, M.P. (chairman), hoped to be able to give satisfactory explanations relative to the report and the accounts, the present position of the company, the policy of the directors, and, so far as possible, make a forecast as to the future. He fully recognised, he said, the responsibility of the position of being the chairman of so important a company. During the past year they had had to face many extraordinary difficulties. In addition to the great depression, which he was sorry to say still continued, they had had to face loss of credit owing to sinister reports going about relative to the probable closing of the Palace. The directors had consequently to do all in their power by way of advertising and giving attractive entertainments to show the public that not only was the Palace open, but that it was full of life and vitality. The directors were of opinion that the success of the Palace depended upon spending money in advertising and making it more and more popular. The increased expenditure of last year showed marked results. It had been suggested that the debenture holders should have increased representation on the board, and it was proposed to call a special meeting to increase the number of the directors to the maximum of nine, for the election of two debenture holders to seats on the board. The directors would continue to give their best attention to the affairs of the company, and he hoped their efforts year by year would be crowned with success. In conclusion, he moved the adoption of the report, which was seconded by Mr. Jonas Levy. A discussion followed, in which several gentlemen took part, and the management was criticised by some speakers as unsuccessful, and it was maintained that it would be the better course to make some changes in the directorate, so as to bring new blood upon the board, instead of increasing the number of directors. Other speakers were of opinion that as the company had practically started afresh under their Act of last year the directors should not be hampered by changes in carrying out their policy. The report was adopted. Mr. Bovill then moved "That in view of the fact that the Great Eastern Railway Company can and does carry passengers from Enfield to London and back for 2d., third class, a distance of about eleven miles, approximately the same as the Crystal Palace, this meeting requests the directors of the Brighton and Chatham Railway Companies to convey third-class passengers to the Palace and back for 6d., so that return tickets, with admission, may be issued at 1s. each." Mr. S. J. Wilde seconded the resolution, which was carried.

At a meeting of the Convocation of the University of Oxford, at two p.m. on Tuesday, the 14th ult., the degree of Doctor of Music was conferred upon Professor Joseph Joachim, honoris causâ. There was a crowded house, and the Professor was received with great applause. Several distinguished English and foreign musicians were present among the spectators. Dr. Joachim was presented for the degree by the Public Orator, the Rev. W. W. Merry, D.D., Rector of Lincoln College, who in doing so made the following felicitous speech:—"Reverendissime Vice-Cancellarie, vosque egregii procuratores, Duco ad vos insignem virum Josephum Joachim, Academiæ Berolinensis socium, Scholæ autem Musicæ quæ ibidem fundata est consiliatorem primum. Hunc virum non modo numerosa Apollinis arte dotatum et fidibus cummaxime scientem, verum etiam a prima usque pueritia Musicæ studiis deditum, eundemque Mendelssohnii, felicit et sanctissimi magistri, discipulum acceptissimum, Academia Oxoniensis libenti animo ordinibus suis adscribit. Quis est quæso quem fugerint Thebani vatis verba barbiti laudes concelebrantis, quibus nempe vinculo Jovis aquilam obstringat, qua dulcedine Martem ipsum bellipotentem peremptet? Cui non venit in mentem Arionis delphino invecti fabula? Cui non occurrit Orphei imago nunc immitem Plutonis aurem demulcentis, nunc silvas ipas quæque incolerent feras vocali citiharæ strepitu ducentis? Quæ quidem omnia haud scio an prodigiis præteriti seculi commenta rectius habere oporteat, an futuri temporis quasi præsagium. Et enim quando antehac tanto in honore fuit Ars Musica? Quando vires tantas cum in privata tum etiam in publica vita exercuit? Adeo ut cum Pythagora pæne crediderim mundum ipsum ad numerum intervallorum et concentuum quodammodo moveri. Neque tamen illustrem Virum illum solum ob causam excipiamus licet quia in Arte sua pæne incredibilem solertiam adeptus tot tantisque humano generi lætitiis intulit, verum multo magis quia ipse singulari morum sanctitate, summa mentis sobrietate, sincero veritatis amore imbutus id præcipue agit ut, optimi philosophi Platonis exemplum secutus, Musam cœlestem, omnibus fallaciis ac præstigiis exutam, nobis quam purissimam ostendat, virtutemque ipsam haud magis quam artem musicam instituat. Quamobrem, volentibus cunctis et acclamantibus, præsentio vobis Josephum Joachim ut admittatur ad gradum Doctoris in facultate Musicæ, honoris causâ."

On the 13th ult., at Belmont Hall, Grafton Square, Clapham, there was given, under the auspices of the Clapham Choral Society, a most successful Concert-lecture. The lecturer was Mr. W. A. Barrett, who delivered a highly interesting and instructive discourse on the history of the Part-song. He was listened to with great attention by an audience which, though not quite so large as it would have been had the weather been more favourable, was thoroughly appreciative. Mr. Barrett, in a clear and concise manner, traced step by step the progress and development of madrigals and part-songs from the reign of Queen Elizabeth down to the present time. The lecture, at its various stages, was illustrated by the singing of numerous part-songs, which were, in most instances, given with great taste and skill by the choir of the Clapham Choral Society, under the leadership of Mr. Walter Mackway. Special reference may be made to Stevens's beautiful glee, "The cloud cap't towers," as well as to Henry Leslie's "My love is fair," and W. Macfarren's "You stole my love." The rendering of these secured for the choir, in each case, a well deserved encore, and the first two had to be repeated. The other composers, examples of whose works were given, were Festa, Lassus, Benet, Ford, Purcell, Spofforth, Smart, G. A. Macfarren, W. S. Bennett, J. Hampton, and A. J. Caldicott.

A WRITER in the Boston Daily Traveller, in an appreciative notice of "A short History of cheap Music," among other things says the following, which we have much pleasure in placing before our readers:—"In this book Messrs. Novello, Ewer and Co., while tracing the rise of their house from the humble beginning made by Vincent Novello in London in 1811, have contributed the most succinct account, or at least have given it in outline, of the musical development of a people during four generations—a period wherein the arts and mechanics reached their greatest height—of which we have any knowledge. The attitude of the Novellos, as publishers, counsellors, and entrepreneurs in the cause of music in England during the last fifty years is one of direct philanthropy; their policy has been broad and liberal; they have been public benefactors and educators, and in solidifying and augmenting their own fortunes they have earned no envious or reproachful word. It would be a pleasure did space permit to write more at length about the pretty brochure which is the subject of our talk; it is all charmingly written, and there is a benediction to begin it from Sir George Grove. Incidentally the book conveys a great deal of information and there is a capital index."

CONCERTS for all purposes, and in pursuit of various ends, are frequently given. Those designed on purely humanitarian purposes are rare, but are no less interesting. Therefore little apology is necessary in calling attention to an excellent Concert which was given by the officials and patients of Bethlem Hospital, on Friday evening, the 17th ult. The programme was of moderate length and was excellently rendered by all concerned. The chief items were Haydn's "My mother bids me bind my hair," sung with excellent taste by Miss Savage; "The Bugler" (Pinsuti) and "Marjory's Cuckoo Song" (Harraden), both executed with much expression by Miss Lanford. Miss Rough gave Wekerlin's "Night wind soft"; Miss Dyer sang Coudrey's "Bunch of violets" (violin obbligato by Mr. Haigh); Miss Bear, Field's "Jockey to the Fair"; and Mr. Barker, Sullivan's "Time was when love and I" and "O swallow, swallow" (Piatti), violoncello obbligato, Dr. Smith. Instrumental works were also played by Miss Savage and Miss Day (pianoforte), Mr. Haigh (violin), and Dr. Savage (violoncello). All the above, both vocal and instrumental, were given with excellent effect.

A DRAMATIC Recital, interspersed with music, was given by Mrs. Rudolf Blind and Mr. Herbert James at the Vestry Hall, Hampstead, on the 11th ult., when a varied and attractive programme was presented. Mr. James's recitations were marked with much point and intelligence, both Browning's "Pied Piper" and Gilbert's "Yarn of the Nancy Bell" being received with much favour; in the latter, especially, the grim humour of the old mariner was admirably characterised. Several scenes from "Macbeth" were included in the programme, and both reciters were recalled at the conclusion of the murder scene. The lady was not altogether equally successful with her colleague. The Recital was varied with pianoforte music, played by Miss Carmichael and Miss Jessie Meadows, the latter lady, who replaced Miss Constance Bache (unavoidably absent), being heartily applauded. We must, however, take exception to the employment of Locke's music to "Macbeth," as the scenes which were recited had no connection with those parts of the play in which the music is interpolated.

MISS TOMBLESON gave her second annual Concert at the Lecture Hall, New Southgate, on the 16th ult., when she was assisted by Miss Mildred Harwood, Mr. W. T. Upton, Mr. Charles O'Neil, Miss Louisa Pyne (pianoforte), and Miss Clara Titterton (violin). The Concert-giver sang very effectively Benedict's "From Bosom of Ocean" and Cowen's "Home," receiving for the last-named a very hearty encore, to which she responded by singing "The Minstrel Boy." Miss Harwood was also very successful in her songs, winning an encore in Cowen's "It was a dream." One of the chief successes of the evening was, however, won by Miss Clara Titterton, whose violin solos were enthusiastically applauded. Mr. Charles Fry recited a scene from "Hamlet" and from "The School for Scandal," and in response to an encore for the latter gave one of Gilbert's Bab Ballads with humorous effect. Mr. Howard B. Humphrey was an efficient accompanist.

MR. W. JOHN KIPPS gave an evening Concert at the New Cross Public Hall, on the 10th ult. Mr. Kipps played Chopin's Ballade in A flat, and pieces by Schumann, Pauer, W. Macfarren, and Raff. Mr. Kipps' performances should be encouraging to his many well-wishers, and the results attained cannot fail of adding largely to the interest with which the talented young artist's career will be followed. And not only as an executive musician did Mr. Kipps figure on this occasion. A MS. song, which served to show his powers as a composer, was sung by Mr. Harper Kearton, and met with much favour. Mr. R. E. Miles sang a couple of songs with ability, and Miss Bertha L. Ball and Madame Worrell were the other vocalists. Master Gerald Walenn played two violin solos. Mr. H. R. A. Robinson was the accompanist.

A STUDENTS' Orchestral Concert, in connection with the Stamford Hill Academy of Music, took place on the 13th ult. in the Assembly Rooms, Stoke Newington. Onslow's Quintet in A minor was played by Messrs. E. E. Halfpenny, H. Gibson, J. B. Zerbin, E. Woolhouse, and Haydn Waud in a most musicianly manner. Miss Philp, in Raff's Cavatina, Miss Routledge in the Tarantella in G, also by Raff, and other pieces given by Mr. S. Runtz, Master E. L. Halfpenny, Mr. G. F. H. MacDonald, Miss A. Stuart, Misses W. Cook, A. Harris, A. Stuart, and D. Frost were well received. The orchestra performed several pieces during the evening. The vocal portion of the programme was entrusted to the Misses Williamson, Lottie Smallman, A. de Cosson, Alice Ashton, Philp, and Durrant.

MR. FREDERICK BEVAN gave a Concert on Monday evening, the 6th ult., at Brixton Hall, the presence of several well-known artists serving to attract a crowded audience. The contributions of Mr. Bevan comprised Gounod's "Nazareth," a new song from his own pen, "Brother Ambrose," and, as an encore, "Heart of oak." Mr. Bevan was also associated with Mr. Edward Lloyd in a capital rendering of Balfe's "Excelsior." The remainder of the programme was ably carried out by Miss Mary Davies, Madame Isabel George, Miss Eleanor Rees, Mr. Edward Lloyd, Signor Tito Mattei (pianoforte), Herr Poznanski (violin), Mons. Albert (violoncello), Mr. C. S. Jekyll (organ), and Mr. Turle Lee (accompanist). The St. George's Glee Union also assisted.

THE Stormont Road Choral Society, under the conductorship of Mr. Frank Idle, gave the third Concert of their eighth season at Lavender Hill, on the 21st ult. Sir Arthur Sullivan's Oratorio "The Prodigal Son" occupied the first portion of the programme. Miss Eveleen Carlton, Miss Greta Williams, Mr. Maldwyn Humphrys, and Mr. Richard Green were the soloists, and gave full effect to their share in this beautiful work, while the result of careful rehearsal was manifest in the smoothness and precision with which the choruses were rendered. In the second part of the Concert the performers above-named contributed songs. Mr. Dyson's violin selections were well received. Miss Abel, Mr. Knight, and Mr. Frank Idle were the accompanists.

ONE of the features of the season at Nice was the Concert given by our young English vocalists, Mr. George Aspinall and Mr. Charles Copland, at the Salle Rumpelmayer, on the 4th ult. They were assisted by Mdle. Labordette, and Messrs. Simonetti (violin), Oudshorn (violoncello), and Beray (piano). Mr. Aspinall gave with great effect Blumenthal's "Message," and joined Mr. Copland in the duet from Halévy's "Reine de Chypre." Mr. Copland sang Pinsuti's "Bedouin love song," and received a perfect ovation for his fine dramatic rendering of "Eri tu," from Verdi's "Ballo in Maschera." At the close of the evening the vocalists were presented with a magnificent laurel wreath. The Concert was altogether a great success and was attended by a large and fashionable audience.

THE Dean and Chapter of St. Paul's Cathedral have appointed Dr. George Clement Martin as successor to Dr. John Stainer as Organist. Dr. Martin has been master and trainer of the children of the choir since 1872, and the excellent state of that section of the choir is due to his careful and conscientious teaching. He is a very able organist, an excellent accompanist and solo player, and his compositions are indicative of wide sympathies. His music for the service of the church shows him to be one of the most prominent among modern English church musicians. Dr. Martin has chosen Mr. W. Hodge as his assistant Organist, and both will enter upon their duties in June next.

At the second Concert (fourteenth season) given by the members of the Crouch End Choral Society, on the 7th ult., at Christ Church Schoolroom, Crouch End, Mr. Wilfred Bendall's Cantata "Parizādeh" was performed. The soloists were Miss Margaret Hoare, Miss Marie Middleton, and Mr. Morgan Wilkinson. A special item in the second part of the programme was a new Patriotic Cantata, entitled "Our Watchword," by E. G. Croager, consisting of baritone solos, with chorus, sung by Mr. Wilkinson. There was a small orchestra of strings, supplemented by piano, ably played by Miss Preston. Mr. Alfred J. Dye acted as Conductor.

THE "Captives of Babylon," an Oratorio by George Shinn, Mus. Bac., Cantab., was performed with orchestral accompaniment at the Mansion House Chapel, Camberwell, on the 15th ult. The solo parts were very creditably rendered by Mrs. S. Gordon Spriggs, Miss Leah Marchant, Mr. Filmer Rook, and Mr. Chas. Hardy. Mr. E. Franklin Rook presided at the organ, and Mr. S. Gordon Spriggs (Organist of the Chapel) conducted the work. The choruses were sung with great precision, the marks of expression being very carefully observed by a choir numbering nearly 100 voices. The proceeds of the Concert were given to the Organ Fund.

THE Woodside Park Musical Society gave an excellent performance of Gade's "Psyche," on the 16th ult., at Woodside Hall, North Finchley. The solo parts were cast as follows:—Psyche, Miss Ethel Winn; Proserpine, Madame Winn; Eros, Mr. Arthur Thompson. The chorus, which numbered over eighty voices, did ample justice to the various choral numbers which abound in this charming work, while the accompaniments were well played by a string quintet, led by Mr. E. Halfpenny. Mrs. Williams presided at the piano, and Mr. Alfred J. Dye conducted. The second part was miscellaneous.

THE first season of the St. Stephen's, Canonbury, Musical and Literary Society was brought to a close on the 9th ult. by a very successful Concert. The vocal items were sung by Miss Thornthwaite, Miss Emary, Mr. Smithett, Mr. C. T. Johnson, and Dr. G. de B. Watson. Miss H. M. Johnson and Mr. O. E. F. Cobb played "Scherzo Brillant," Sponholz, and "Hungary" (Aus aller Herren Länder), Moszkowski. The choir gave "The Watchword" (Pinsuti) and "Silent Night" (Barnby). Miss Edith White and Mr. R. Tidey contributed two violin and pianoforte duets to the programme.

ON Saturday evening, the 11th ult., there was a Special Evensong at the West Hackney Parish Church, at which, in place of the usual anthem, Parts 1 and 2 of "The Messiah" were performed. The choir of the church had been augmented to 100 voices by members of other choirs. The various solos were excellently sung by Master Charles Steward and Messrs. S. Barnby, H. Thom, and T. Kempton. The choruses were rendered with great precision and effect. Mr. F. L. Kett, Choirmaster of the Church, conducted, and Mr. R. T. Gibbons, F.C.O., presided at the organ.

MR. SNAZELLE'S Entertainment was given on the 3rd ult., at Princes' Hall, with considerable success, some of his Recitals, accompanied with music, being very admirably rendered. Perhaps his most successful efforts were Dickens's "Death of Jo" (with music) and his own "Bill Adams at Waterloo." Mr. Snazelle also sang several popular songs in his well-known style. The pianist was Miss Marie Brooke. Mention should be made of the scenoscopic illustrations, which were undoubtedly very beautiful and added to the attractiveness of the entertainment.

AN excellent performance of "Elijah" was given by the Borough of Hackney Choral Association, under Mr. Ebenezer Prout, on the 6th ult., at the Shoreditch Town Hall. An extremely favourable impression was made by Miss Agnes Wilson, a young soprano with a powerful voice, and sister to Miss Hilda Wilson. Among the other soloists who rendered good service were Madame Clara West, Miss Rose Dafforne, Mr. John Probert, and Mr. Watkin Mills. The choruses were well sung by Mr. Prout's fine choir.

A CONCERT was given by the Hornsey Rise Musical Society, in the new Jubilee Room, on Monday, the 6th ult. The "Hymn of Praise" constituted the first part, with Miss Adelaide Mullen, Miss Amy Beresford, and Mr. Henry Beaumont as soloists, who were greatly appreciated by a large audience. Mr. Beaumont's voice and singing should be specially mentioned. Miss Beresford secured a double encore in the second part, and Mr. W. G. Wood, the Society's Conductor, worthily shared the honours of the evening with the artists above named.

MISS JULIA JONES gave her second annual grand evening Concert on Wednesday, the 1st ult., at the Morley Hall, Hackney, which was well filled by a fashionable and critical audience. Miss Jones sang very artistically "Softly sighs," and her pure soprano voice was also heard very advantageously in the duet with Mr. Tufnail, "Where are you going to, my pretty maid?" Miss Rose Dafforne's singing was all that could be wished for, and both in "The worker" and "The dear wife" she was exceptionally good. The Concert in every respect was a success.

MR. THOMAS VINCENT DAVIES gave his first Concert at St. Andrew's Hall on the 11th ult. The following performers took part: Miss Edith Marriott, Miss Hannah Jones, Mr. Joseph Hay, Mr. Kendall Stuart, and Mdle. Adelina Dinelli (violin). A male voice choir sang several pieces, including a Serenade, "Moonlight," and a quartet, "Search me, O God," by the Concert-giver, which were well rendered. Mr. Davies was assisted at the pianoforte by Miss Meta Scott, who also played as a solo a Fantasia on Scotch Airs.

THE Stratford Musical Festival will take place at the Town Hall, on Saturday, Monday, and Tuesday, the 10th, 12th, and 13th inst. There are forty-four prizes, of the value of £70; and the principal adjudicators are Messrs. J. F. Bridge, Mus. Doc. (of Westminster Abbey); J. F. Barnett (Royal College of Music); A. Randegger, Hon. M.R.A.M. (Royal Academy of Music); Berthold Tours. A Concert by the prize-winners, with the distribution of prizes and certificates by the Mayoress of West Ham, will conclude the session.

A CONCERT was given at St. Andrew's, Lambeth, on the 11th ult., in aid of the School Fund. An interesting programme of a miscellaneous character was presented, the vocalists being Miss Selina Quick, Master W. Beazley, Mr. George Bartlett, and Mr. W. Laurence Bryant. Miss Day contributed some pianoforte pieces by Handel and Chopin in a clever manner, and the choral class sang some part-songs by Schumann, Barnby, &c., under the direction of Mr. Henry Randall, Organist of the Church.

A NEW patent touch regulator for pianofortes (uprights only) has been invented by Mr. E. A. Sydenham, with the object of giving the student unlimited power of instantly altering the touch of his pianoforte (assuming it to be a light touch naturally) to any degree of stiffness that may be desired, with the object of developing the muscular power of the fingers in a much shorter time than it would otherwise occupy, thus enabling him to play with ease and comfort on pianofortes which have a stiff or heavy touch.

ON Saturday evening, the 4th ult., a grand Vocal and Orchestral Concert was given at the Morley Hall, Hackney, by the Albany Orchestral and Concert Society. The solo vocalists were Miss Maude Snell, Miss Lottie West, Mr. Sinclair Dunn, and Mr. Alfred Thorpe. Violoncello solo, Herr Anton Flatau; cornet solo, Mr. Thomas Delahay; fairy bells, Mr. Benjamin A. Parker. Several pieces were also contributed by the band; Conductor, Mr. Edward Maund.

MR. ROBERT BUCHANAN'S Ode, "The New Covenant," written for the opening of the Glasgow Exhibition in May next, has been handed over to Dr. Mackenzie, who has undertaken to set it to music. The words are solemn and dignified and meet for the occasion, and there is no doubt that the music will be worthy of the words. Report adds that the author of "Sophia" and the composer of "Colomba" are collaborating on a popular English opera.

MR. G. AUGUSTUS HOLMES, Organist of St. George's, Camberwell, gave his usual monthly Organ Recital in that church on the 19th ult. The programme, consisting of works by Batiste, Smart, Wallis, Salomé, and Guilmant, was performed in an admirable manner, to the gratification of the large audience assembled. Vocal music was excellently rendered by Miss Marion Holmes and Miss Ella Cleugh.

A CONCERT was given on the 7th ult. by the St. Luke's Choral Society, in St. Luke's Hall, Nightingale Lane, Balham, under the direction of Mr. Walter Mackway. The programme included Niels Gade's Cantata the "Erl-King's Daughter." Praise is due to the Society for the artistic rendering of this work. The soloists were Miss Montagu-Conyers, Miss Lucy Etheridge, and Mr. Musgrove Tufnail. Accompanist, Mr. Sidney H. Hann.

THE first Concert of the St. Stephen's Choral Society, Clapham Park, took place at St. Stephen's Mission Hall, on the 8th ult. The programme included part-songs—which were rendered by the Society in an efficient manner—and solos and quartets by the Misses Figg, Izod, Spicer, and Starkey; and Messrs. Clark, Douthwaite, Figg, Izod, and Withers. Miss Starkey accompanied with good taste, and Mr. J. H. Olding was the Conductor.

BACH'S St. John's "Passion" Music is to be given, under the direction of the Rev. Willoughby Carter, on each Friday evening during the present month (except Good Friday), at 8 p.m., in the Church of the Holy Trinity, Stroud Green, with Miss Margaret Hoare, Miss Lena Law, Mr. T. W. Hanson, Mr. Robert Hilton, and a full orchestra. The church, which holds 1,200 people, is to be opened at 7.15 p.m., and admission is quite free.

DURING his recent sojourn in Italy Dr. Mackenzie composed an Overture to Shakespeare's "Twelfth Night." The work is of large dimensions, and illustrates various personages and scenes in the comedy, the life and humour of which it quaintly reflects. Dr. Mackenzie has not yet orchestrated the Overture, but there is a probability of its production at one of the Richter Concerts.

ENGLISH music will not be absent from the programme of the Festival at Chester next summer. We believe that the Committee have accepted two choral works from the pen of Mr. Oliver King, whose new Concert Overture made so favourable an impression in St. James's Hall on the 22nd ult. We shall hail with pleasure a Festival success for this persevering and clever young musician.

MR. CHARLES SALAMAN attains his seventy-fourth birthday on the 3rd inst. It will be celebrated on the day following at his house by many eminent vocalists and other celebrities in the dramatic, musical, and art world. The present year is also the sixtieth since his entrance into professional life, his first public appearance as pianist and composer having been made on the 23rd June, 1828.

MR. J. LOARING, F.C.O., gave an Organ Recital at the Parish Church of St. Nicholas Cole-Abbey, on Tuesday, the 7th ult. His programme included the following pieces: Air with Variations in D, Haydn; Organ Concerto, No. 2, Handel; Overture "Artaxerxes," Dr. Arne; "La Carita," Rossini; Rondo de Campanelli, Morandi; and The Bride's March, Loaring.

THE Kyrle Choir, under the direction of Mr. F. A. W. Docker, gave a performance of "Elijah" in St. Mark's Church, Walworth, on the 22nd ult. The soloists were Mrs. Stanesby, Miss Alice Suter, Mr. Edward Branscombe, and Mr. Albert Oran. Mr. E. H. Turpin accompanied on the organ.

MR. JOSEPH BARNEY is to be the adjudicator at the fourth Choral Competition of the Association of Tonic Sol-fa Choirs, to be held at the Crystal Palace in June next. At the great Concert in the afternoon Mozart's Twelfth Mass and a Selection will be performed, with full orchestra, under the direction of Mr. L. C. Venables.

MR. J. H. OLDING, Organist of St. Stephen's, Clapham Park, gave an Organ Recital on Sunday afternoon, the 12th ult., at St. Andrew's, Stockwell. The programme included Handel's Organ Concerto in D minor, and compositions by Smart, Wély, Reissiger, Bach, and Mendelssohn. Mr. J. W. Brooks was the vocalist.

THE first number of a new publication called "The Meister," the journal of the Wagner Society, has just been issued. It is edited by W. Ashton Ellis, and contains articles by J. S. Shedlock, Charles Dowdeswell, and others. It is adorned with a quaint emblematic frontispiece designed and presented to the journal by Mr. Percy Anderson.

THE Annual General Meeting of the Choir Benevolent Fund was held at the Chapter House, St. Paul's Cathedral, on the 14th ult. A favourable Balance-sheet and Report, showing the financial position of the Society to be highly satisfactory, was read and adopted for printing, and the usual election of officers took place.

ON the 1st inst., at 8 p.m., Dr. Stainer's "Crucifixion" will be sung at St. John's Church, Smith Square, Westminster. The choir will be increased by some choristers from Westminster Abbey, and Messrs. Maldwyn Humphrys and R. E. Miles will be the vocalists, and Mr. G. J. Bennett, organist. It will be repeated on the 22nd inst.

MR. G. H. WILSON, of Boston, Mass., has issued a prospectus of the fifth volume of his Musical Year Book to be published in May next. The plan proposed will make it, as it desires to be, a satisfactory consensus of the musical activities of the whole country.

UNDER the direction of Mr. H. Davan Wetton a selection of sacred music was given by the choir of St. Gabriel's Church, Pimlico, at St. George's Union, Fulham Road, on Thursday evening, the 16th ult. The singing was much enjoyed by the inmates.

Two prizes are offered by the Madrigal Society—one of £10 and the other of £5—for the best and second best Madrigals, in not less than four nor more than six parts. MSS. should be addressed to the Secretary of the Madrigal Society, Mr. J. Edward Street, by October 1.

ON Saturday afternoon, the 18th ult., a meeting was held at the Whitehall Rooms, Hotel Métropole, under the presidency of Mr. Joseph Barnby, for the purpose of presenting to Mr. A. Pollitzer a gold repeater watch and a testimonial signed by his past and present pupils.

AT her Pianoforte Recital, given at Steinway Hall on the 1st ult., Miss Marian Bateman executed a well-chosen selection of compositions, by various masters, to the entire satisfaction of a numerous and appreciative audience.

THE new organ at Christ Church, Endell Street, which is to replace the one damaged by lightning last year, will be supplied by Mr. Alfred Monk. The same builder has also in hand a new organ for Amesbury, Wilts.

AN Organ Recital was given on Tuesday, the 7th ult., at All Saints' Church, Hatcham, by Mr. E. J. Sturgis, interspersed with vocal selections performed by members of the choir.

MISS AGNES ZIMMERMANN has happily recovered from her late severe illness. She is recuperating her strength at the seaside, and will return to London very shortly.

REVIEWS.

Webster's Music Copy Book.

[Edinburgh: Oliver and Boyd.]

A COPY book with the lines of the staff for reproducing some of the signs and characters employed in music, instead of the ordinary moral precepts, is an item of education which deserves to be supported. The idea is very good, but it is doubtful whether Mr. Webster can claim originality for it. Something of the same kind was introduced by Mr. Willert Beale a few years back.

Part-Songs for Treble Voices. Specially adapted for High Schools. Edited by Frances E. G. Carey Brock and M. A. Sidebotham. Part 1. [Novello, Ewer and Co.]

THE continual demand for good music for school purposes has doubtless prompted the Editors to make the endeavour to supply what is wanted. In this, the first part, there are six trios, "Hail! star of Eve," adapted from Spofforth's "Health to my dear"; "The wreath," by C. Mazzinghi; "Here in cool grot," by Lord Mornington; "Evening," by Henry Smart; "To stay at home is best," by Berthold Tours; and "There is a Spirit singing aye in air," by M. A. Sidebotham, one of the Editors of the publication, the two last-named pieces appearing for the first time. They are of a character which invites if it does not command admiration. The judicious union of the new with the old brings with it a special attraction, which ought to make the work popular, not only with schools where there is a distinct demand for these things, but also with choral societies where female voices alone are available, and with those who desire to study music of all kinds, whether it does or does not bring all their resources into requisition.

Suite for Pianoforte, in G. By Francesco Berger. [Novello, Ewer and Co.]

THIS remarkably clever and spirited composition is thoroughly modern and original in tone, though the title and the divisions are borrowed from ancient usages. There is a Prelude, bold and striking; a Gavotte and Musette, with an old-world flavour, but of modern strength; an Andante Religioso full of dignity; and, as a needful contrast, an Irlandaise replete with gaiety and dash. Concerning this section of the Suite, we are told that at a recent State Concert in Berlin, Mr. Emil Bach from London was commanded to be the pianist. "He played with great success a variety of pieces, but created a real sensation in Francesco Berger's 'Irlandaise,' Prince George of Prussia (nephew to the venerable Emperor), himself a distinguished amateur, made many enquiries about this piece—asking if it was original or an adaptation—and requesting that a copy might be sent to him as soon as ready." A charming "Barcarole" completes the Suite, which may be confidently recommended to pianists both professional and amateur. Each of the movements is dedicated to a popular pianist.

Six Two-part Songs for Female Voices. Words by E. Oxenford. Music by Battison Haynes. [Novello, Ewer and Co.]

MR. BATTISON HAYNES has shown in certain of his former compositions that his work is worthy of a good reception by those who are interested in the progress of our young native musicians. The present collection of duets offers a further proof of a desire to convey by favourable channels the theme of his originality. The titles of the duets convey to the minds of those who have studied these things an idea of their character. "The swallow's flight," "Night has passed away," "O sing again, ye happy warblers," "A summer's night," "Lo! the lark to heaven soaring," and "Winds are blowing o'er the lea." The vocal parts are simple, melodious, effective, and attractive, the accompaniments are a little more elaborate; in no case do they overload the voices, but furnish such an amount of characteristic quality which could only be expressed by means of an instrument. They are unquestionably worthy evidences of musical power on the part of the composer.

A Woman's Heart. Ballad by Charles Salaman. [Stanley Lucas, Weber and Co.]

THE words of this ballad, by Malcolm Charles Salaman, the son of the composer, are far above the average of ditties of its kind. They are not only good words for singing, but they are words of sense, rare qualities which should command recognition when they appear. The music, by the hand of one who has written some of the most beautiful and thoughtful songs of the age, is vocal, expressive, and effective, characteristics which do not always mark the generality of the songs of the day. The temptations to rush into print because of the facilities offered tends to the multiplication of mediocrity. It is therefore refreshing to come across a good and earnest effort by one whose hand is guided by experience and whose expressions are always entitled to attention and respect.

Vier gesänge für eine mittlere Stimme mit begleitung des Pianoforte. Componirt von Fr. Wilh. Jähns. Op. 62. [Berlin: Schlesinger.]

THE words of these songs, by various authors, are severally entitled "Widmung," "Was ich dir wollte," "Mein Ross geht langsam," "Ich bin der Sturm," and "Liebesunmuth." There is a commendable feeling for melody in each of the songs, which is exhibited and maintained even through the restlessness of tonality which seems to have been adopted as a concession to modern demands. The songs require the utmost attention to expression on the part of the vocalist and a certain amount of sympathetic quality of tone of voice to do them justice. The words are in the original German, but they would doubtless be more acceptable to English musicians through the medium of their own tongue.

Six Vocal Duets. Composed by Wilfred Bendall. [Joseph Williams.]

THE art of writing interesting music for two voices is becoming more and more a matter of recognition on the part of musicians. It is not however given to all to be successful in their efforts to provide things as fitting as necessary. Mr. Bendall has the power of writing melodiously and the art of making his melodies interesting alike to the singers as to the hearers. These duets to words by Barry Cornwall, Shakespeare, and others, though not of equal power as music are of equal worth as supplying a need successfully. The accompaniments are most pleasing, and as in the case of "The sun and the brook" and "Snow-bloom," full of character.

Daily Exercises for Mezzo-Soprano, Soprano, or Tenor. By Albert B. Bach. (Third Edition.) [Metzler and Co.]

THIS most valuable series of exercises is intended as a practical supplement to the author's lectures on "Musical Education and Vocal Culture." They consist of a series of passages for the acquisition of flexibility of voice, expression, intonation, and ornamentation. A preface of some length gives general directions as to the manner in which the exercises should be used, combined with a number of suggestions which are of the utmost value to students. The "Daily Exercises" are laid out upon principles which can scarcely fail to meet with approval because of their clear and reasonable character.

Favourite Melodies for Violin and Piano. Arranged by F. Weekes. [Weekes and Co.]

FIVE of the numbers of the third series, containing Parry Cole's "Spring flowers," Balfe's "When other lips," Godwin Fowle's "Golden trumpets March," Kluss's "Wilkommen Gavotte," and Kuhlau's "Ronda Burlesca," arranged in easy form for players of moderate pretensions, will doubtless be welcomed by them. Some of the passages, such as the repeated notes in No. 26 of this series, are excessively trivial, and point to a want of artistic purpose which should not exist in pieces constructed out of favourite melodies and designed to be popular.

Fantasias on popular National Airs for Violin and Piano-forte. By W. H. Birch. [Weekes and Co.]

VIOLIN players of modest pretensions need not fear to find their requirements overlooked in the flood of compositions and arrangements daily poured from the press. The present fantasias formed out of English, Irish, Scotch, and Welsh melodies will probably serve to minister to the needs of beginners, but they have few artistic qualities and very little educational value.

Dance of Mummies; and Polonaise. By Joseph C. Bridge. [Weekes and Co.]

THESE are two clever pieces of workmanship. The first is full of joyous rhythm and quaint melody such as might be fitting to the purpose implied in its title. The second is a remarkably graceful, and original piece of music, free and spontaneous in character. They are both well adapted for use as solo pieces or for teaching purposes.

Five Romances for Violin and Pianoforte. By G. A. Macfarren, R.A.M. [Edwin Ashdown.]

The facility with which the late Principal of the Royal Academy could write in any school of music is shown in these pleasant little pieces for violin. The Andante Cantabile in G, the Allegro in E minor, the Andante in F, the Allegretto in D, and the Andante con moto contain characteristics of style which are to be found in English, German, French, and Italian writers for the violin. All the pieces are good and might be studied by players with considerable advantage to themselves.

Three Part-Songs for four voices (S.A.T.B.) 1, Heralds of Spring; 2, The Month of May. 3, Merrily row we. Written and composed by John Greig, Mus. Bac.

[Novello, Ewer and Co.]

THESE three unpretentious little compositions—all in the key of A major—will, we think, be acceptable to choirs in search of novelty. They are melodious, clearly written, and easy to sing. No contrapuntal effects are attempted, the words being merely smoothly set and carefully harmonised. The third is, we think, the best of the three.

FOREIGN NOTES.

WEBER's posthumous opera fragment "Die drei Pintos," repeatedly referred to of late in these columns, was produced for the first time, in the completed form given it by Herr Mahler, on January 20, at the Leipzig Stadt-Theater, and was exceedingly well received. "Seldom in modern days," says a competent critic in the Neue Zeitschrift für Musik, "has it fallen to my lot to witness such genuine, unmistakable enthusiasm as was the case on this occasion." The performance has since been several times repeated and the interesting novelty will now doubtless make the round of German operatic stages, being already in course of preparation at several of the leading theatres in the Fatherland.

A music festival extending over three days is to take place in June next at Stuttgart, when the performances will include Handel's "Joshua," Schumann's "Paradise and the Peri," Beethoven's "Eroica" Symphony, and Wagner's "Parsifal" Prelude. Among the artists contributing solo performances are mentioned Johannes Brahms, Dr. Joachim, and Eugene d'Albert. Dr. Faisst, of Stuttgart, will be the Conductor.

An important and highly interesting collection of antique musical instruments, formerly in the possession of Herr Paul de Witt, of Leipzig, has just been purchased by the Prussian Government, and will be permanently exhibited at the Berlin Royal Academy of Music (Hochschule).

The excellent Choral Society "Liederkrantz," of Frankfurt, celebrated last month the fiftieth anniversary of the foundation of the Mozart Institution, originated by the above Society. At the Concert performance in connection with the celebration, the programme consisted chiefly of works by former stipendiaries of the institution, among the most distinguished of whom may be mentioned Joseph Brambach and Max Bruch.

The Leipzig "Liszt-Verein," under direction of Herren Nikisch and Siloti, has undertaken to give a series of orchestral Concerts during the present month at St. Petersburg and Warsaw, when they will introduce such works by the late pianist-composer as are, as yet, little known in Russia.

We read in the Musikalisches Wochenblatt: "The recent performance at the Vatican chapel of a Mass by Palestrina, in connection with the Papal Jubilee celebration, has served to demonstrate the decided decline of the once so justly famous choir, the intonation being faulty, and the attack, too, leaving much to be desired. This falling off has been noticeable ever since the death of Baini, the choirmaster under Gregory XVI. and Pius IX."

The first performance at the Munich Hof-Theater of Verdi's "Otello" took place on the 5th ult., and was a brilliant success. The theatre was crowded by an enthusiastic audience, and after the fourth act, which produced the greatest effect, the principal interpreters were recalled seven times—an occurrence altogether unprecedented here, except in Wagnerian opera. Herr Vogl gave the title-role, Herr Gura the Iago, and Frau Schöller the ill-starred heroine, the work generally having been placed on the stage in excellent style.

Theodore Gouvy's new choral-work "Electra" (with a German translation of the libretto by Dr. Langhans) was most successfully produced last month at Duisburg under direction of Musik-director Grüter, and in the presence of the highly gratified composer.

M. Camille Saint-Saëns has gone to Algiers for the benefit of his health, and has taken with him the libretto of his new opera "Benvenuto Cellini," destined to become the great novelty at the Paris Grand Opéra during the approaching Exhibition year.

Extremely successful first performances of Wagner's "Lohengrin" have recently taken place at the Verdi Theatre of Padua, and at the Royal Opera of Madrid, the latter under the direction of Signor Mancinelli.

In the course of an interesting discourse on Beethoven, recently delivered by Herr Hanslick in the Austrian capital, the eminent critic of the Neue Freie Presse played to his audience three, it is said, hitherto unknown dances emanating from the master's most mature period—viz., that in which the Ninth Symphony was written.

A music festival is being organised at Copenhagen, which will be devoted entirely to compositions by Scandinavian masters; those, inter alia, by Kuhlau, Gade, Grieg, Svendsen, Emil Hartmann, Lindblad, Josefson, and Kjerulf.

Out of a total number of fifty-three new operas by German composers submitted to the Royal Opera of Berlin during the past year, only four have been accepted for performance during the present season. These are: "Der Haideschacht," by Herr Holstein; "Turandot," by Herr Rehbaum; "Lorelei," by Herr E. Naumann; and "Irrungen," by Professor Lorenz.

Wagner's entire "Nibelungen" tetralogy was performed last month at the theatre of Carlsruhe, under the energetic direction of Herr Felix Mottl. There was a numerous and enthusiastic audience, including many foreign musicians and art-lovers.

Richard Wagner's pre-Wagnerian opera (sit venia verbo!) "Die Feen," emanating from the earliest period of the master, will be produced for the first time on any stage in May next at the Munich Hof-Theater.

A monument, wrought in marble, the work of an Italian artist, has just been erected over the grave of Leopold Damrosch, the late genial and energetic Conductor of the New York German Opera.

Wagner's "Götterdämmerung," the final part of the famous tetralogy, met with a most enthusiastic reception on its first performance (January 25) at the Metropolitan Theatre of New York, under the direction of Herr Anton Seidl.

Under the title of "Het Proefsot" (The Trial-shot), Weber's evergreen "Freischütz" has just been performed for the first time with a Dutch version of the libretto at Amsterdam, previous performances of the work in Holland having been either given in French or in the original German.

Rubinstein's "Biblical opera," "Sulamith," is shortly to be produced in concert-form at the Royal Opera of Berlin. This melodious and picturesque work was first produced in 1883 at the Hamburg Stadt-Theater, under the composer's direction, and has since been unaccountably neglected.

Mr. Frederic Lamond, the gifted Scottish pianist, is just now engaged upon a Concert tour in Germany, and has recently met with a most gratifying reception, both at Hanover and Hamburg. At the present moment Mr. Lamond is at Berlin, where he was announced to play three Concertos by Brahms, Henselt, and Saint-Saëns, besides giving a Concert of chamber music, in which he was to introduce two new compositions of his own—viz., a Pianoforte Trio and a Sonata for pianoforte and violoncello. We shall continue to follow the progress of this remarkable young artist with much interest.

At an interesting Concert recently given by the Paris Société des Compositeurs de Musique, a number of pianoforte compositions by old masters were performed on instruments appertaining to the period in which they were written, among those used on the occasion having been an excellently preserved clavecin by Jaskin (1775). Other instruments of the clavier kind exhibited at the same time included a clavecin by Zell (1736), an Italian spinet by Abel Adam, of Turin (1714), a clavecin inscribed "F. Debbonis Cortonensis fecit Roma, 1677," a clavichord of the seventeenth century, and several instruments by Pleyel, amongst them the one used by Chopin during the years 1846-1848.

A permanent Italian opera is to be established at the Paris Eden Theatre for the performance of operas exclusively by Italian and French composers. Verdi's "Otello," Boito's "Mefistofele," and Ponchielli's "Gioconda" will be the Italian works to be first placed upon the répertoire.

The Paris Le Ménestrel enumerates no less than twenty performances of operatic works of French origin that have been given during one week on different German stages last month.

The long expected première at the Paris Grand Opéra of M. Salvayre's "La dame de Monsoreau," took place on January 30; but the new work entirely failed to please the audience and has been almost universally condemned by the French press. The principal interpreters, MM. de Reszké and Delmas, and Mlle. Bosman, did their best in order to render the music attractive, and the scenery and general mise-en-scène are described as magnificent.

According to the statement of German papers, the operatic performances to be given in connection with the forthcoming Great Exhibition at Bologna will include Wagner's "Tristan und Isolde," with Herr Winkelmann as Tristan. This extraordinary and most difficult work has hitherto been produced, outside of Germany, only in London and in New York, and by German companies. While on this subject, it is curious to notice from the recently published Wagner-Liszt correspondence what the master writes to his friend, in what must have been one of his most desperate humours, concerning "Tristan"—then as yet an unknown quantity in the musical world—viz., "I have some idea of getting some one to make a good Italian translation of the work and to offer it to the theatre of Rio de Janeiro (which will most likely shortly produce 'Tannhäuser') for first performance as an Italian Opera." The italics are our own.

The following is a list of the projected operatic and concert performances in connection with the International Exhibition to be held at Bologna—viz., Gluck's "Alceste," Sacchini's "Œdipus," Cimarosa's "Il Matrimonio segreto," an Opera by Piccini, an Intermezzo by Pergolesi, Overtures and Symphonies by Lulli, Scarlatti, Bach, Haydn, Mozart, Boccherini, Beethoven, Mendelssohn, Schumann, and Berlioz. To the probable production also of Wagner's "Tristan und Isolde" we have already alluded. Among sacred works are named Mendelssohn's "Elijah" and Wagner's "Das Liebesmahl der Apostel." A truly representative "international" programme this, if really carried out!

The well known Male Choir of Zurich, consisting of some 130 members and conducted by Herr Attenhofer, will give two Concerts next month at the Theatre della Scala, of Milan, with the co-operation of the La Scala orchestra.

Filippo Angeleri, pianist and composer of merit, died recently at Milan, aged seventy-two.

Matteo Luigi Fischetti, pianist and successful composer of an opera entitled "Aida di Scafati," died lately at Naples, aged fifty-seven.

The death is announced at Vienna of Thomas Klein, one of the eminent virtuosi on the clarinet, and professor of that instrument at the Viennese Conservatorium. Klein had attained the mature age of eighty-six.

TO CORRESPONDENTS.

* * Notices of concerts, and other information supplied by our friends in the country, must be forwarded as early as possible after the occurrence; otherwise they cannot be inserted. Our correspondents must specifically denote the date of each concert, for without such date no notice can be taken of the performance.

Our correspondents will oblige by writing all names as clearly as possible, as we cannot be responsible for any mistakes that may occur.

Correspondents are informed that their names and addresses must accompany all communications.

We cannot undertake to return offered contributions; the authors, therefore, will do well to retain copies.

Notice is sent to all subscribers whose payment (in advance) is exhausted. The paper will be discontinued where the Subscription is not renewed. We again remind those who are disappointed in obtaining back numbers that, although the music is always kept in stock, only a sufficient quantity of the rest of the paper is printed to supply the current sale.

FAIRPLAY.—The plan you suggest had better be placed before the director of the Concerts.

F. E. B. (Ludlow).—The thing is a pure invention.

M. L. P. (Wellingborough).—No date given in the account sent either this month or the last.

R. G. W. H.—You have stated a fact.

S. (Edinburgh).—Letter duly received.

BRIEF SUMMARY OF COUNTRY NEWS.

ADDLESTONE.—A Concert in aid of the Macfarren Scholarship Fund at the Royal Academy of Music was given on Monday, the 13th ult., under the direction of Mr. Fred. Monk, Organist of Lyne Church, near Chertsey. Miss Ethel M. Boyce, Miss Hetie Schindler, Master Gerald Walenn, Mr. W. H. Tupper, Mrs. A. R. Cobbett, Mrs. Monk, Mr. W. Moir, Mr. Percival Vernon, and Mr. Summers Gill (Mr. Monk's pupils) gave their services. Several specimens of Sir G. A. Macfarren's music were performed.

BARDSLEY.—On Monday evening, the 13th ult., an Organ Recital was given at the Church of the Holy Trinity in aid of the Organ and Chancel Fund, by Mr. Eli Cope, Organist of St. Peter's, Ashton. The programme included pieces by Mendelssohn, Jules Grise, Bach, W. T. Best, Lemmens, Dearnaley, Rossini, and Guilmant—selections which were listened to with the utmost attention. Miss Eaton was the vocalist, and she sang the aria "Hear ye, Israel," from Elijah (Mendelssohn), with much effect, and imparted a deeply religious feeling to the sacred song "Requiem Æternam" (Piccolomini) and to "I know that my Redeemer liveth" (Handel).

BECKENHAM.—On the 7th ult. an interesting Concert was given in the Public Hall by Mr. W. H. Burgon. The first part was miscellaneous, the second, the Garden Scene from Faust. The vocalists were Miss Du Bedat, Miss Helen Armstrong, Madame Ella Collins, Mr. Henry Beaumont, and Mr. Burgon. Mr. Henry Leipold was solo pianist and accompanist.

BURNLEY.—The ladies' singing class, conducted by Mr. W. A. C. Cruickshank, Mus. Bac., Oxon, held its annual invitation Concert, under Mrs. A. Townley Parker's patronage, in St. Peter's Girls' School, on the 3rd ult. In Prout's Cantata Queen Aïme the duet was sung by Mrs. Parker and Mrs. Cruickshank. Mrs. Parker was cordially encored for her solo "Be wise in time" (Dorothy). Mrs. Cruickshank sang Tours's "At the Eastern Gate," and in Marziani's Canon, "Friendship," with Miss Nuttall. Miss Hartley gave some pianoforte solos by Bennett and Schumann, and duets were played by pupils of Mr. Cruickshank, who conducted and presided at the harmonium. Mr. Broughton was the accompanist.—On the 9th ult. Holy Trinity Church Choir gave a Concert, the vocalists being Miss Fannie Sellars, Messrs. Arnold, Burrell, Hartley, and Critchley. The Glee Club gave part-songs with much taste, and Messrs. F. and T. Heaton joined Mr. R. Watson, the Organist, in Haydn's Trio (No. 1).—The General Aid Society to the Blind held its annual meeting and Concert on the 9th ult., when all the executants were blind, and gave a varied and interesting programme. Mr. Wolstenholme, Mus. Bac., contributed "Chit-chat" (Mattei) and Beethoven's Sonata (No. 1).—Gilbert and Sullivan's comic operetta Trial by Jury was presented in the Lane Head Schools, on the 11th ult.

CARLISLE.—On Friday, the 10th ult., Messrs. B. Scott and Son gave their fourth grand Concert. The services of Mr. Charles Hallé and his renowned orchestra (numbering nearly eighty) were secured for the occasion. The programme was a most varied one, and contained three Overtures, Leonora (No. 3), Tannhäuser, and Semiramide; Weber's Pianoforte Concerto, Mendelssohn's "Scotch" Symphony, Schubert's Entr'acte and Ballet music from Rosamunda, Liszt's Hungarian Rhapsody (No. 2), Air Slav, Delibes' Coppelia, &c. These were played in the most superb and faultless manner. Mr. Hallé's brilliant execution was heard to great advantage in Weber's Concerto. His playing of Heller's "La Truite" and "Wanderstunden" was a charming performance. The Concert was a thorough success.

CROYDON.—On the 14th ult. a most successful and interesting Concert was given here by Mr. W. H. Burgon, when the Garden Scene from Faust formed an attractive portion of the programme. The artists were Miss Thudichum, Miss Lane, Miss Jeanie Rosse, Mlle. Dinelli, Madame Ella Collins, Madame Clara Perry, Messrs. Henry Beaumont, Frederic King, W. H. Burgon, and Henry Leipold.

DARTFORD.—A Concert was given in the Conservative Hall on the 6th ult. The first part of the programme was miscellaneous. In the second part was produced a new one-act comic op-eretta, entitled The Queen of Hearts, libretto by E. Thomas, music by Harriet Young. The music is bright and pleasing, and the entire piece bristles with amusing points. Mr. Musgrove Tufnal as the swaggering Major, Mr. T. W. Page as the amorous Castleton, and Madame Wilson-Osman as Euphemia rendered the various characters with conspicuous ability, and were each called to the front at the close.

DEVIZES.—On Tuesday evening, the 14th ult., Mr. H. Millington gave a grand Concert at the Town Hall, assisted by Miss Anna Williams, Miss Damian, Mr. W. H. Breerton, Mr. Orlando Harley, Miss Netta Thornton (solo violin), Mr. Arthur L'Estrange (solo pianist and Conductor). The attendance was not large owing to the great snowstorm, but the artists were at their best and gave great satisfaction by their well-directed efforts.

DOVER.—The Harmonic Society, under the bâton of Mr. J. W. Howells, gave a very successful Concert at the Town Hall, on the 7th ult. The principals were Miss Kate Norman, Miss Fannie Elgar, Mr. Alfred Kenningham, and Mr. Rhodes. Mr. Albert Hill (the hon. secretary of the Society) acted as accompanist, the band and chorus comprising upwards of 150 performers. The Concert was in two parts, the first comprising a selection of sacred items—viz., Handel's Occasional Overture, Mozart's "Splendete Te Deus," Mendelssohn's Hear my Prayer, and other pieces. Bennett's May Queen occupied the whole of the second part.

DOWNPATRICK.—The Musical Society gave a miscellaneous Concert on the 2nd ult., when a number of Part-songs, Madrigals, &c., were rendered in a manner that showed considerable improvement upon last year. Songs, &c., were given by Miss Adelaide Mullen, Miss Ryan, Miss Fleming, Mr. Henry Beaumont, and Mr. Orr. Mr. Wilson conducted.

ERITH.—A Concert was given in the Public Hall, on the 13th ult. by Mr. W. Sanderson, Organist of the Parish Church. The principal soloists were Mr. James Bayne, Mr. J. Anderson, and Miss Nellie Roberts. The orchestral music reflected great credit upon Conductor and performers.

ESHER, SURREY.—Mr. J. E. Adkins, Organist of the Parish Church, commenced a series of six Organ Recitals on Monday, the 6th ult., and has arranged his programmes with the view of showing and contrasting various schools and composers. His first Recital consisted of examples of French, Belgian, and German masters. Guilmant, Batiste, Wely, and Salomé were drawn upon for the first-named; Lemmens for the Belgian; and Bach, Mendelssohn, Rheinberger, and Handel for Germany. Mr. Wilfrid Jones gave two vocal illustrations: Gounod's "There is a green hill" and Handel's "Thus saith the Lord." On the 13th ult. English and German music was presented, with examples from Dr. Roberts, Dr. Stainer, Dr. Bridge, Sterndale Bennett, and H. Smart; and Handel, Merkel, Schumann, Mendelssohn, and Beethoven, respectively. Mr. Kilby was the vocalist on this occasion, and gave Sullivan's "Chorister" and "Sound an alarm" (Handel). Each night there were large assemblies, H.R.H. the Duchess of Albany being of the number, and evidently taking great interest in the music given on the organ erected as a memorial to her late husband. The Recitals will be continued until the 11th inst.

FROME.—A most enjoyable Concert was given at the Mechanics' Hall, on the 7th ult., by a band and chorus numbering upwards of eighty performers, under the leadership of Mr. T. Grant, for the benefit of the library fund of the Mechanics' Institution. The first part of the programme consisted of selections from Handel's Oratorio Samson. The soloists were Miss Bradbury, Miss B. Grant, Mrs. Rogers, Mr. H. J. Morgan, Mr. J. Lewis, Mr. P. E. Deggan, and Mr. F. C. Tucker. The second part opened with the Overture to Auber's Masaniello. Mr. and Mrs. H. Welham, Mr. Miller, Mr. G. Bourke (contra-bass), and Herr Schottler (violin) sang or played solos. Miss Deggan was the accompanist.

GRANTHAM.—On the 9th ult. the Amateur Vocal Union gave Beethoven's Engele and Smart's Bride of Dunkenron. The principals were Miss Adelaide Mullen, Mr. Henry Beaumont, and Mr. J. B. Smith. Conductor, Mr. Dickenson.

GRAVESEND.—The twenty-sixth Concert of the Gravesend and Milton Choral Association was given on Tuesday evening, January 31. The artists were Miss Hope Glenn, Miss Alice Gomes, and Mr. Charles Chilley as vocalists, and Mr. J. T. Carrodus, solo violin. Mr. Carrodus played pieces by Ernst, Chopin, and Paganini, each selection being most exquisitely rendered. In response to encores Mr. Carrodus played two extra pieces. The singing of Mr. Chilley deserves especial mention. Several good part-songs were rendered in a highly creditable manner by the members, under the bâton of the Conductor, Mr. Charles R. Green. Mr. Howard Moss, besides successfully contributing a pianoforte solo, most ably accompanied all the performers.

GREAT YARMOUTH.—On Thursday, the 9th ult., the Musical Society gave its first Concert this season in the Drill Hall, York Road. The chief work performed was Sir Arthur Sullivan's Martyr of Antioch, in which the principal vocalists were Madame Lita Jarrett, Miss Emelie Lloyd, Mr. Edwin Bryant, and Mr. Conrad Formes. The choruses were all well rendered. The work of the band was admirably carried out under the leadership of Mr. Cooke, of Ipswich, and Mr. Tunbridge presided at the harmonium in his usual able manner. The second part of the programme was of a miscellaneous character. Pinsuti's beautiful Part-song "In this hour of softened splendour" was excellently interpreted, as was also "The iron horse" (Pearson), which brought the Concert to a very spirited conclusion. The greatest praise is due to the indefatigable and talented Conductor, Mr. Stonex, to whose efforts most of all the success of this Society is due.

HAY.—The new organ, built in the Parish Church by Messrs. Brindley and Forster, was opened on the 10th ult. There were full choral services both morning and evening. In the afternoon there was an Organ Recital by Mr. Allan Paterson, which was well attended.

HEREFORD.—A very enjoyable Concert was given on the 2nd ult., in the Museum Room of the Free Library, under the direction of Mr. George Saul. Mrs. Glover Eaton received an encore for the song "Lo, here the gentle lark," flute obbligato, Mr. Somerton, of Worcester. Mr. Saul gave Handel's well known Andante and Allegretto, and as an encore, "Auld Robin Gray"; Mr. Castings was successful in his song "Close to the threshold," violoncello obbligato, Mr. George Fortescue; Mr. Ineson received an encore for Pinsuti's "The Bedouin love song"; Madame George Fortescue's harp solo was much appreciated; the glee party sustained their reputation by their performance, and the band, under the leadership of Mr. Saul, played well. Mr. A. T. Mason presided at the piano.

HIGH WYCOMBE.—On the 13th ult. the Choral Association gave their second Concert of the season in the Town Hall. The programme included Mendelssohn's 95th Psalm, Reay's Part-song "The dawn of day," and Garrett's "O my love's like a red, red rose," songs by Mozart, Cowen, Sullivan, &c., and Chopin's Nocturne (Op. 32, No. 1), and Albanesi's Menuetto (Op. 41). There was a large audience, and the performance was excellent, reflecting the utmost credit on the Society. Mr. J. G. Wrigley, Mus. Bac., Oxon., conducted.

HOLSWORTHY, N. DEVON.—On Tuesday, the 13th ult., a Concert was given in the Bible Christian Schoolroom by the Choral and Orchestral Societies. The Concert opened with a pianoforte duet by Mrs. J. H. Stranger and Mr. J. Furse, Jun. The pieces given by the orchestra were "Marche aux Flambeaux," "Sweet Memories," "Reve d'Or," and "Bruder Lustig"; and by the choir, "Wake, the light is breaking"; "Sir Knight, up, quit thy bower," from Oberon in Fairyland. Conductor of the choir, Mr. Furse. Songs were also given by Miss Moore, Dr. Gray, Messrs. Prout and Jolliffe. A clarinet solo by Mr. Furse and the violin solo by Mr. R. N. Stranger (leader of the orchestra) were much appreciated.

LEEK.—Mr. P. A. Rayner gave his sixth annual Concert in West Street School on the 3rd ult. The principal vocalists were Miss Lottie Herod, Miss J. Rankin, Mr. C. Blacow, and Mr. A. S. Kinnell, members of the celebrated Manchester Vocal Society, and Miss Hope Glenn, of London. Solo violinist, Mr. Otto Bernhardt; Conductor and accompanist, Dr. Henry Watson, Musical Director of the Manchester Vocal Society. Miss Hope Glenn received quite an ovation from an appreciative audience. The Manchester Vocal Society's quartet of vocalists contributed a number of duets, trios, and quartets with much skill and refinement, and all their efforts met with a hearty recognition. Mr. Otto Bernhardt's two solos evoked enthusiastic applause. The accompaniments were well played by Dr. H. Watson.

MAIDENHEAD.—The Philharmonic Society gave their second Concert of the season in the Town Hall, on the 14th ult., before a large audience. The chief item in the programme was Sterndale Bennett's Cantata The Woman of Samaria, which received an admirable rendering. The solo parts were sung by Miss Katherine James, Madame Annie Chappell, Mr. Ralph Dawes, and Mr. David Hughes. Part-songs by Reay and Garrett, songs by Wekerlin, &c., and two pianoforte solos—Nocturne in G (Op. 32, No. 1), Chopin; Menuetto, Albanesi—played by the Conductor, Mr. J. G. Wrigley, Mus. Bac., Oxon., formed the second part of the programme.

NOTTINGHAM.—A grand Concert was given in the Mechanics' Large Hall, on Monday, the 13th ult., in aid of the Nottingham Church Day Schools, by a select choir of 400 voices attending the various schools and a band of thirty performers. The principal vocalists were Miss Maggie Jaques, Miss Fannie Lynn, Mr. Sedgwick, and Mr. Bingley Shaw; Conductor, Mr. J. Selby. Miss Fannie Lynn and Mr. Bingley Shaw carried off the honours of the evening, and the choir were encoered for their spirited rendering of "In steady march." The hall was crowded in every part.

OLDHAM.—The second of a series of Concerts by the St. Cecilia Musical Society was given at the Co-operative Hall on Monday, the 13th ult. The band and choir numbered upwards of 100 performers, and the programme was selected entirely from the works of Sir H. R. Bishop. The Overture to Guy Mannering, and the glees, which formed the main feature of the Concert, were rendered in fine style. The choir gave evidence of good training and the tone produced was highly satisfactory. The soloists were Miss Chadderton, Miss Hartley, Mrs. Slater, Mr. Mills, and Mr. Chadderton. On Saturday evening, the 18th ult., the members of the Singing Class connected with Springhead Congregational Sunday School presented to their respected teacher, Mr. Thomas Birkenshaw, an ebony bâton, handsomely mounted in silver.

PORTSMOUTH.—A Concert was given here, on the 14th ult., in aid of Miss Robinson's Soldiers' and Sailors' Institute at Alexandria, Egypt. The audience numbered about a thousand. The bright particular stars of the evening were Madame Mabel Sydney and Mr. Seymour Kelly. Mrs. Seymour Kelly was also heard to advantage. Mr. G. W. Allen was especially successful with his two recitations. Messrs. J. H. MacWilliam and J. J. Rockett also contributed songs. The string band of the Connaught Rangers was in attendance. Mr. H. Austin Story accompanied throughout in his usual finished manner.

READING.—The members of the Orpheus Society gave the first Concert of the season on the 2nd ult., in the New Town Hall. An attraction on this occasion was the production of a new Cantata by Dr. Bridge, entitled The Festival, from the poem by Archbishop Trench, under the personal direction of the composer. Mr. F. J. Read, Mus. Bac., was Conductor, and Mr. C. H. Sippel was accompanist. Miss Annie Marriott, Mr. Percy Palmer, and Mr. H. P. Huggins took the solo parts. The harp accompaniment was played by Mr. J. Thomas, and Mr. A. W. Moss was at the organ. The Festival describes a scene at a banquet to five hundred princely guests, given by the great Caliph, Haroun al Raschid. The minstrel is called upon for a song befitting the occasion and is promised a rich gift. The minstrel replies, wishing happiness and prosperity to the great ruler. Being urged on to a higher strain and promised a higher reward, the minstrel foretells that all this glory is but vanity, and that the mighty ruler will return to dust. This arouses the anger of the guests, but meets with the approval of the Caliph, who sees in it a rebuke for their levity and revelry. The music, very taking and appropriately descriptive of the scene, was well rendered. The second part of the Concert included some interesting solos and part-songs.

REXFORD.—Mr. Hamilton White gave a Concert in the Town Hall on Thursday, the 9th ult. Miss Vinnie Beaumont and Mr. J. Allan Scott were the chief singers. On this occasion, too, Mr. White introduced an orchestra of some sixteen performers, whose achievements gave satisfaction. Miss Clark was solo pianist and fulfilled her duties in a very satisfactory manner, and the vocal class, numbering about sixty, acquitted themselves, as usual, with the greatest credit and success in their part-songs. "The Snow-white Doe," a humorous hunting part-song expressly composed for, and dedicated to Mr. White and his vocal class by Mr. W. W. Pearson, author of "Three Doughty Men," "Iron Horse," "Three Children," &c., was given in such a manner as to win a decided encore. A Quintet in A, for muted strings, by members of the band, was excellently rendered. The Concert, which throughout was of exceptional merit, was concluded with Mr. White's own arrangement of the National Anthem.

RUSHDEN.—The Choral Society gave a performance of Mendelssohn's Oratorio Elijah in the Public Hall, on January 31. The soloists were Miss Maude Hare, Miss Josephine Cravino, Mr. Percy Palmer, and Mr. William Bradford. There was a band and chorus of 100, with Mr. William Skinner as Conductor, and Mr. J. E. Smith as leader of the band.

SALISBURY.—The Vocal Union gave their twenty-eighth Concert in the Banqueting Hall of the Council Chamber, on the 2nd ult. There was a large attendance, and the Mayor, E. Waters, Esq., presided. The first part was devoted to a performance of Birch's Cantata The Wreck of the Argosy. The soloists were Miss Futchin, Miss Forder, Mr. Henry Kirby, Mr. Hayden, and Mr. James Bush, all of whom were very successful. The choruses were excellently rendered and the accompaniments very efficiently played on the pianoforte and organ by Miss Winifred Harwood and Mr. Alfred Foley respectively. The second part was a miscellaneous selection of part-songs and solos by Miss Hunt, Mrs. Paffard, Mr. Crook, Mr. Miles, and others. Miss Hicks gave a Recitation, "Oriska," by Mr. Sigourney. Mr. J. M. Hayden was the Conductor.

SCUNTHORPE, LINCOLNSHIRE.—At the annual Concert of the Scunthorpe Choral Society, on the 13th ult., Bennett's May Queen was sung. The solos were taken by Miss Winnie Beaumont, Mrs. Weigall, Mr. Gregory, Mus. Bac., and Mr. McCall. The Rev. E. M. Weigall conducted, and the Rev. W. Insull accompanied on the pianoforte. The performance was very successful.

SHERBORNE ABBEY.—Mr. G. E. Lyle, Organist, &c., of the Abbey, gave an Organ Recital on Saturday afternoon, the 11th ult. His programme was selected from the writings of Batiste, Mendelssohn, Rink, Lefebvre-Wély, Bach, W. Spark, C. Vincent, E. M. Lott, Handel, Beethoven, and Costa.—Mr. Lyle repeated the programme on Tuesday evening, the 14th ult., for the benefit of business people.

SLIGO.—The Musical Society gave a performance of Gade's Crusaders on the 14th ult., under the direction of Mr. A. T. Froggatt. The part of Rinaldo was taken by Mr. Drummond Hamilton, of Christ Church Cathedral, Dublin (in the unavoidable absence of Mr. Bapty). The Cantata was followed by a miscellaneous selection, including Hatton's "Indian maid" and Dr. Mackenzie's "Three merry dwarfs." Mr. Delaney, Organist of the Roman Catholic Cathedral, played Moscheles' "Sonate Mélancolique" with great delicacy of expression.

SMALLBRIDGE.—On Thursday evening, the 16th ult., the Smallbridge Choral Society gave Handel's Judas Maccabæus in St. John's Schoolroom. The principal vocalists were Miss Schofield, Mrs. Mason, Mr. J. R. Leach, and Mr. T. H. Lord. Mr. A. Crossley was the Conductor. The various pieces were well rendered. Miss Schofield received an encore for the air "From mighty kings," and an encore was also accorded to Mr. T. H. Lord for a capital rendering of "The Lord worketh wonders." Mr. J. R. Leach gave a very effective rendering of the air "Sound an alarm," and the chorus singing was very good.

SOUTHWELL.—On Thursday, the 2nd ult., His Grace the Archbishop of Canterbury re-opened the Choir of the Cathedral, and was assisted by the Bishop of Lichfield and the Bishop of Salisbury, who preached at the morning and evening services respectively, and six other bishops, twenty-two canons, and 400 clergy of the diocese. The musical services were very elaborate throughout the day. The choir of the Cathedral were assisted by lay clerks and boys from the Cathedral choirs of Lichfield, Lincoln, and York. The solos in the Anthems were very finely rendered by Mr. Bingley Shaw, Mr. Longmore, and Mr. Dawson.

STAFFORD.—A performance of Gaul's Holy City was given by the Choral Union, on Monday, the 6th ult., under the conductorship of Dr. E. W. Taylor. The band and chorus numbered about 200 performers. The principal vocalists were Miss Mill, Miss Delia Atkins, Mr. Briton, and Mr. Horrex, while secondary parts were taken by Miss Moore and Miss Mansfield. The leader of the band was Mr. W. Cheedle; the harp was played by Mr. Cockerill, of the Birmingham Festival band.

STAINES.—The Choral Society gave a performance of Samson on the 7th ult., with Miss Fusselle, Miss S. Riley, Mr. Gawthrop, and Mr. Sutton Shepley as principals. The orchestra was strengthened by the assistance of members of the Windsor and the Thames Valley Orchestral Societies, Mr. H. W. Hunt, of St. Jude's, South Kensington, being leader. Mr. G. F. Huntley, Mus. Bac., Cantab., conducted.

STEYNING, SUSSEX.—A Concert was given at the Town Hall, on Thursday evening, the 2nd ult., by Mr. W. H. J. Cambridge, Organist of the Parish Church. Miss Edith Welling, Mrs. Cambridge, Mr. Argyle Galloway, Mr. Tucker, and Mr. George Welling were the vocalists. One of the features of the evening was Mendelssohn's Hear my prayer, sung by Miss Edith Welling and the Steyning Choral Society, under the conductorship of Mr. James White. A new sacred song, "Lead, kindly Light" (composed by her husband), was sung by Mrs. Cambridge. The part-songs by the Choral Society were much appreciated.

TROWBRIDGE.—The Concert given by Mr. H. Millington in Hill's Hall, on the 13th ult., with the assistance of Miss Anna Williams, Miss Damian, Mr. W. H. Brereton, Mr. Orlando Harley, Miss Netta Thornton (solo violin), and Mr. Arthur L'Estrange (solo pianist and Conductor), was artistically successful though the weather was unpropitious.

VENTNOR.—On Wednesday, the 8th ult., the annual Concert of the Choral Society was given at the Assembly Rooms, Mr. E. H. Lemare being the Conductor. The pieces chosen for representation were Sir Arthur Sullivan's Light of the World and Cowen's Rose Maiden. The chorus numbered about 120 voices. The soloists engaged were Miss Kate Norman, Miss Alice Suter, Mr. Ernest Wetherick, and Mr. Seymour Kelly. Mr. E. H. Lemare, F.C.O., also gave a pianoforte solo. The accompanists were the Rev. G. W. Jeadwine and Mr. E. H. Lemare (pianoforte and organ).

WESTON-SUPER-MARE.—On the 13th ult. the local Orchestral Society gave a Concert in the Victoria Hall, before a fairly large audience, considering the snowstorm. Mr. C. A. Windeatt ably conducted a band of fifty performers, led by Mr. Sutton, of London. Haydn's Second Symphony, a selection from Cowen's Language of Flowers, the Overture to Le Domino Noir, Raff's "Fest" March, and a new spirited Overture, "Sir Rupert the Fearless," by Mr. Cuthbert Nunn, of this town, formed the programme. The vocalists were Madame Eva Neate and Dr. Roxburgh, and the accompanists were Mr. C. T. Grinfield and the Rev. H. P. Denison.

WIRKSWORTH.—Mr. E. Birch gave his annual Concert on Tuesday, the 13th ult., in the Town Hall. The principal vocalists were Miss Fannie Lynn and Mr. Bingley Shaw. Miss G. M. Birch, Miss Florrie Birch, Miss Hodgkinson, and Miss Waterson also assisted in the vocal and instrumental department. Mr. Birch was the accompanist and also played a couple of solos.

ORGAN APPOINTMENTS.—Mr. Hepworth C. Hill, Organist and Choirmaster to Holy Trinity, Lamorby, near Sidcup.—Mr. Henry Eason, to St. Thomas's Square Chapel, Hackney.—Mr. Arthur C. Brooks, R.C.M., Organist and Choirmaster to Beaconsfield Parish Church.—Mr. F. Barrow Dowling, to St. George's Cathedral, Cape Town.—Mr. Frank Wm. Prosser, Organist to the Mayor's Chapel (St. Mark's), Bristol.—Mr. Arthur Reynolds, A.C.O., Organist and Choirmaster to the United Presbyterian Church, Moffat, N.B.

CHOIR APPOINTMENTS.—Mr. Talbot Notcutt, Director of the Choir to St. Aloysius' Somers Town, N.W.—Mr. Arthur Reynolds, A.C.O., Musicmaster to the Schools of the United Presbyterian Church, Moffat, N.B.—Mr. A. A. Chippendale (Alto), to St. Bartholomew's, Clyde Road, Dublin.—Mr. Sackville Evans (Solo Bass), to St. Mary-lebone Parish Church.

THE CRUCIFIXION

A MEDITATION

ON THE

Sacred Passion of the Holy Redeemer

THE WORDS SELECTED AND WRITTEN BY THE

REV. W. J. SPARROW-SIMPSON, M.A.

J. STAINER.

This Work is an attempt to supply the want long felt of an easy and short form of Passion Music suitable for use in ordinary parish churches. It is composed for two solo voices, a Tenor and a Bass, and for the church choir. At intervals hymns occur, in which the whole congregation can join. The performance will probably not extend over forty minutes in duration, thus giving an opportunity for a suitable "address" if thought advisable. No orchestra is required, the accompaniments being specially adapted for the organ only; much of the expense usually attending Passion Services will therefore be avoided. The book of the words, for distribution among the congregation, will contain the music of the Hymns; by this means it is hoped that the congregation will be induced to take part heartily in the service.

PASSION SERVICE

FOR THE SEASON OF

LENT AND GOOD FRIDAY

BY

ALFRED R. GAUL,

Composer of the "HOLY CITY," "RUTH," &c.

"Scholarly writing, combined with unmistakable talent, and eminently adapted to the purpose for which it was written and composed, the work will probably be largely used, and Mr. Gaul have to be congratulated upon another success."—Sheffield Independent.

"The course of sacred events connected with the Passion is laid out by the writer so as to form a series of six distinct 'scenes.' The subjects of these divisions, each occupied with a particular stage of the Mystery, are respectively: 'The Traitor at the Table,' 'The Denial,' 'The Condemnation before Pilate,' 'The Mockery on Calvary,' 'The Shadow of Death,' and 'The Holy Sepulchre.' The style of the composition resembles generally that of Mr. Gaul's previous writings—the same effective, grateful part-writing, and the same expressive and melodious treatment of the solo voice. In those sections, notably that of the Unjust Condemnation, where the realistic element is predominant, the composer has manifested his ability to write with dramatic force and intensity as well as with lyric charm. In this respect the choral writing distinguished itself in comparison with that in the 'Holy City,' and other of the composer's works. Mr. Gaul has not written new hymn tunes for the author's lyrics; the tunes selected are from among those in ordinary congregational use. Altogether considered, Mr. Gaul's new work will, undoubtedly, greatly enhance his already high reputation in the line of sacred composition."—Musical Standard.

AN ORATORIO COMPOSED BY

GEO. SHINN, MUS. BAC., CANTAB.

(SUITABLE FOR CONCERT ROOM OR CHURCH.)

Price 2s. Cloth, 3s. 6d.; Sol-fa, 1s.

"Mr. Shinn is well known as the author of several Cantatas and other compositions, all of which are written in a style at once musicianly and popular. 'The Captives of Babylon' may be highly commended as an interesting and valuable addition to our shorter Oratorios and Cantatas. The work contains several solos of much beauty; also duets, quartets, and choruses in great variety. Choral Societies, which desire an interesting and moderately easy work to perform, will do well to select this Oratorio. It will well repay the time spent in its preparation, and will be sure to take."—Sunday School Chronicle.

"The music is appropriate, interesting, melodious, and but of moderate difficulty. The work is one of Mr. Shinn's best efforts, and we all know that Mr. Shinn has written some charming music. We heartily recommend this Oratorio to Choral Societies."—Essex County Chronicle.

"'The Captives of Babylon' will be found a welcome addition to the répertoires of Choral Societies and Church Choirs."—The Musical World.

"The libretto is well chosen, and forms a good base whereon to compose a first-rate work. With regard to the music we feel we can hardly do it justice. Mr. Shinn's composition is a veritable picture, following the details of his subject minutely. Where all is so good it is difficult to mention any special numbers. We certainly advise our readers to hear the work and judge for themselves."—United Service Gazette.

"It is cleverly written, and in an attractive style. The music is of a varied and pleasing character, so that it is likely to become very popular."—The Portsmouth Evening Mail.

"An effective work."—Musical Opinion.

"Contains many very interesting numbers, and will doubtless be much appreciated by those in search of something new."—The Newcastle Daily Journal.

"Mr. Shinn is well known, and deservedly so for his musical talent. Continuity of design and freshness of conception are apparent throughout the work. It contains many effective solos and choruses, and the music is not difficult. There is no doubt that the Oratorio will become very popular."—South London Press.

RUTH

ALFRED R. GAUL.

"The work, like the 'Holy City,' is full of beautiful orchestral passages, while the vocal score abounds with charming numbers."—Bucks Herald.

"'Ruth' is a work of sterling power; its musical form is that of perfect tunefulness combined with simplicity and strength. . . . The composer has grasped his theme in a thoroughly sympathetic manner, and has produced a work which is worthy of the subject."—Bradford Observer.

"Bright, tuneful, fresh, and musicianly—this work will be a great favourite, and will add to Mr. Gaul's reputation."—Birmingham Weekly Dart.

"'Ruth' has been set to music by several composers; none, however, has become so worthily popular as the Cantata under notice. . . . It contains some charming music, and is highly characteristic of the story it so vividly illustrates."—South Wilts Express.

"Full of flowing melody."—Salisbury Times.

JOAN OF ARC

ALFRED R. GAUL.

"In abstract musical merit we are inclined to regard it as an advance on the earlier work, 'The Holy City.' . . . The choruses are written with much knowledge of effect, and one of them, 'On to the battle, on,' is exceedingly spirited. An 'Ave Maria,' and the final chorus of the 'Spirit Voices' may be named as really charming."—Athenæum.

"As in his other works, particularly 'The Holy City,' the composer writes admirably for the solo voices, and equally well for the chorus. . . . The fact must strongly be insisted upon that 'Joan of Arc' is a work which is bound to be widely taken up by provincial societies, doubtless to attain which end the composer has employed but three soloists, and has given a more than usually large degree of importance to the choral work. . . . The 'Ave Maria' is singularly beautiful, and will probably be considered the gem of the work."—London Figaro.

"'Joan of Arc' was last night produced for the first time in the metropolis by Mr. McNaught and the admirable choir of the Bow and Bromley Institute. . . . Obviously written with a special view to the requirements of provincial and other choral societies, and likely to become highly popular."—Daily News.

"Calculated to delight performers and listeners, being full of melody and taking effects."—Referee.

"Must enhance the high reputation of its composer. From beginning to end 'Joan of Arc' is marked by perfect and natural melody, a smoothness that is really delightful, and instrumentation that indicates the touch of a masterhand."—Liverpool Courier.

"The music from beginning to end is of the highest order, both in form, construction, dramatic expression, and religious colouring. Particularly beautiful is the great wealth of melody, which carries with it the impression that it is the outcome of the inspiration and genius of a highly-refined musician. . . . The Cantata is even a more masterly and beautiful work than 'The Holy City.' . . . 'Joan of Arc' is one of the most melodious, refined, and expressive works that has come under our notice."—Huddersfield Examiner.

"No more charming Cantata than 'Joan of Arc' could have been chosen. It abounds in delicious music. There is not a tedious note in it, nor any number which can be accused of impairing the dignity of a composition having a lofty aim."—Newcastle-on-Tyne Daily Chronicle.

"Gives the listener a vivid and realistic impression, its attractiveness being continuous instead of spasmodic."—Bradford Observer.

"The choruses are always effectively written—the solos are extremely melodious; deserves, and will probably achieve, great popularity."—Newcastle-on-Tyne Daily Journal.

"There is a reality about the whole tone of the work that seems to bring every scene in the life of the French heroine vividly before us."—Border Counties Herald.

"It would not be surprising if it attained to even the almost phenomenal popularity of 'The Holy City,' contains a similar wealth of melody and effective part-writing."—Birmingham Daily Times.

"Reading the score convinces us that it is our townsman's greatest production. The music displays more skilful workmanship than any music we have received from the same hands. . . . Could have been originated by none but a born melodist."—Birmingham Daily Gazette.

"A distinct advance upon Mr. Gaul's previous work in cantata form. . . . A constant flow of exquisite melodies and effective choral writing."—Birmingham Daily Post.

"Now with matured experience and ripened scholarship he gives to the town which has received and welcomed his first triumphs his magnum opus, 'Joan of Arc.'"—Birmingham Daily Mail.

"The Cantata, from the first bar to the last, is rich in melody, beautiful harmonic combinations, and clever orchestration. The beautiful 'Ave Maria' is a splendid example of pure and fervent church music, but there are so many exquisite points of merit in Mr. Gaul's latest work that they hardly need detailing. Taking the work as a whole, it bids fair to become a great favourite with all choral societies."—Birmingham Weekly Post.

"A thoroughly melodious work, and should find favour with choral societies. It is not difficult to sing, and contains sufficient variety to keep up the interest to the end."—Manchester Guardian.

Price, paper covers, 2s. 6d.; ditto, boards, 3s.; scarlet cloth, 4s.; Tonic Sol-fa, 18s.; Vocal parts, each 18s. Words only, 7s. 6d. per 100. (Ent. Sta. Hall.)

The gratuitous loan of Instrumental Parts may be had on application to the Composer, and full liberty is given to perform this Cantata and to insert the words in any programme without further permission.

CLASSICAL PIANOFORTE MUSIC FOR THE USE OF ACADEMIES, SCHOOLS, & COLLEGES.

PRESS OPINIONS.

MORNING POST.—"Among the many important works issued by Messrs. Hopkinson, of 95, New Bond Street, is an excellent set of educational pieces, entitled 'The Grosvenor Series,' the object of which is to provide academies, schools, and colleges with classical pianoforte music, arranged in well-defined degrees of difficulty, at a moderate cost. The system thus introduced marks a distinct advance in musical tuition, as it places in the hands of teachers material that cannot fail to exercise a beneficial effect upon the taste of pupils. It is of the highest importance that a beginner's earliest impressions should be guarded against the influence of commonplace music, and in 'The Grosvenor Series' professors will find an interesting selection of high-class compositions, adapted for elementary and advanced classes, carefully arranged and fingered. Among the composers whose works have been brought into requisition are Beethoven, Reinecke, Tours, H. Stiehl, M. E. Sachs, G. Merkel, A. Krause, Ignaz Brüll, and others."

DAILY TELEGRAPH.—"The Grosvenor Series is another sign of the times, going to show, in conjunction with much other of a like sort, to what an extent musical taste has improved in England's homes. The Series is well adapted for the use of students. The music is well fingered."

MUSICAL SOCIETY.—"This truly excellent Series progresses apace, and, passing on from its first stage of easy studies, has now reached its Second and Third Series of more advanced and moderately difficult selections, comprising compositions by Bock, Greuzebach, Kunze, Stiehl, Krause, Hennessy, G. Merkel, Bargiel, F. Damm, and B. Tours. Each of these works that we have seen is admirably adapted, not only to develop the acquirement of technique, but also to promote the cultivation of a sound musical taste. Judged as a series of stepping-stones to the more advanced pianoforte compositions of the Great Masters, these musicianly productions well deserve the name of Classical Pianoforte Music."

ILLUSTRATED LONDON NEWS.—"The Grosvenor Series of Classical Pianoforte Music' continues to maintain its interest by furnishing a varied selection of pieces, by composers of the past and the present, well engraved and printed, and at cheap prices."

THE MUSICAL TIMES

AND SINGING-CLASS CIRCULAR.

APRIL 1, 1888.

PRECOCITY IN MUSIC.

THE learned and ingenious Roger Ascham has left on record his opinion about precocity in general. He was well qualified to give one, his experience of youth being hardly less great than his shrewdness of perception. For that reason we commend it now to the reader's notice:—

"This I know, not only by reading books in my study, but also by experience of life abroad in the world, that those which be commonly the wisest, best learned, and best men also, when they were old, were never commonly the quickest of wit when they were young. Quick wits be apt to take, unapt to keep; soon hot and desirous of this and that, as soon cold and weary of the same again; more quick to enter speedily than able to pierce far, even like our sharp tools, whose edges be very soon turned. . . Contrariwise, a wit in youth that is not over dull, heavy, knottish, and lumpish, but hard, tough, though somewhat staffish—such a wit, I say, if it be at the first well-handled by the mother, and rightly smoothed and wrought by the schoolmaster, both for learning and whole course of living, proveth always the best. Hard wits be hard to receive, but sure to keep; painful without weariness, heedful without wavering, constant without newfangledness; bearing heavy things though not lightly, yet willingly; entering hard things, though not easily, yet deeply, and so come to that perfectness of learning in the end that quick wits seem in hope, but do not indeed ever attain unto. . . They be grave, steadfast, silent of tongue, secret of heart; not hasty in making, but constant in keeping any promise; not rash in uttering, but wary in considering every matter, and thereby not quick in speaking, but deep of judgment, whether they write or give counsel on weighty affairs. And these be men that become, in the end, both most happy for themselves and also most esteemed abroad in the world."

These words of wise old Roger are adapted to comfort and cheer many anxious parents who are concerned about the absence of brilliant qualities in their children. Indeed, they tend to transfer the family hope from the clever boy to his ordinary brother, who puts forth as yet no sign of future distinction.

On the other hand, if the hard wit be preferable to the quick wit—or, to put it plainly, the commonplace child be of better augury than the child of bright parts, it becomes a question whether the circumstances of present day life are not multiplying and fostering the second rate article. Even the least careful observer must many times have recognised the fact that intellectual and emotional activities are developed at a much earlier age than was the case not so very long ago. How often do we hear it said in jest that there are no children now-a-days, only little men and women? The remark is intended to cause a smile, but has at the bottom of it a serious truth. Compared to the childhood of by-gone generations, that which we see around us represents a stage of general development which would considerably astonish our fathers, could they come to life again, and, in all likelihood, would fail utterly to obtain their approval. The cause of the change is in no measure a secret. We may look for it partly in improved methods of training, which have removed from children the deadening influence of routine tasks, the utility of which they cannot see, in the mastering of which there is no sense of gain, and consequently no pleasure. The child is educated more than formerly and instructed less. His faculties are stimulated and strengthened in preference to loading his memory with facts. He is encouraged to exercise a spirit of enquiry, instead of being told that "children should ask no questions," and prompted to take an interest in subjects once forbidden on pain of incurring penalties due to forwardness and presumption. The natural result is a higher and quicker intelligence, and a capacity of learning such as far exceeds the standard ordinarily applied to any given age. But we attach far more importance to the general conditions of modern life as an agent in quickening and developing the mind than to any improvements in education. A good prima facie reason for this appears when we contrast the conditions of modern life with those which prevailed a century, or even fifty years ago. Our grandfathers lived in a very small world, often practically bounded by the horizon visible from their bed-room windows. Their life was leisurely, and chiefly concerned with the petty events around them, since the transactions of the great world had become what we should now call ancient history before news of them arrived. Little of a stimulating character excited their imagination or quickened their thought, while a low standard of education rendered them incapable of appreciating much that otherwise might have roused their faculties. Almost the reverse of this now obtains. The speed of modern existence is immense. The scope of its relationships embraces the world, the remotest part of which has been placed, so to speak, next door to the most retired observer. On all hands, human knowledge and power advance with giant strides. Our lives are passed in a region of marvels becoming ever more and more marvellous, and there is no cessation of the stimulating agencies that keep heart and brain in constant exercise. This naturally involves a condition of heavy pressure upon our faculties—a strain under which men and women are constantly breaking down, unable to "go the pace." As naturally it produces a sensitive and highly strung generation, ever breathing the breath of excitement and demanding more and more of it, as the victim of chloral requires stronger and stronger doses of his seductive drug. A volume might be written upon the results which such a state of things tends to cause; but that book would not be complete unless it took into account the law by which the characteristics of one generation are transmitted to the next and the next in increasing ratio. The quick wit, as Roger Ascham would call it, the early development, and the abounding sensitiveness of the present day will increase as time goes on, and our descendants are certain to be as far in advance of ourselves as we are ahead of those who preceded us. When the end of the twentieth century comes, what will the average child be like? what his standard of attainment? what the measure of his development? The answers to these questions we shall never know, but it is easy to believe that that which we now call precocity will then be a normal condition.

There are special reasons for anticipating an earlier and yet earlier development of musical precocity, since music so largely depends upon the sensitiveness and acuteness of feeling which the whole course of modern life tends to foster. It must also be taken into account that sympathy with music, existing to some extent or other even in those who apparently are unmoved by "concord of sweet sounds," is now stimulated by general education, by frequent opportunities of contact with the art, and even by the fashion which has elevated music to high rank in social esteem, and refuses to excuse ignorance or neglect of its claims. All these causes tend to the same result. The time cannot be far distant in which the possibility of undiscovered and undeveloped musical talent will have passed away. There may still exist the "mute inglorious Milton," the Cromwell destined never to wear a sword, the diggers and delvers whose hands "the rod of empire might have swayed"; but not the gifted obscure in music. Talent so fascinating, so readily manifested, so easily appraised as theirs, will be found out and brought forward in that golden age of the art to which we are rapidly advancing.

Under the conditions just stated it becomes of importance to enquire whether early and rapid development of musical gifts, and the multiplication of its instances, work good or harm. The question may, to many readers, seem absurd, and so, in the abstract, it is. From that point of view, we might as well ask whether the healthy growth of a child's body should be regarded as mischievous. It must be considered, however, that many people share a long-descended belief in the unnaturalness of "sharp children." They "like a child to be a child"—that is to say, a young animal of the human species, which eats and plays, and sometimes fights, and submits to training much as does a spaniel or a parrot. Then there is that dreadful word "precocity"—a term of ominous sound, no less terrifying to many worthy folk than "Mesopotamia" was comforting to the old lady of story. The world is very much ruled by words and phrases, and when a gifted child, in whom the force of natural development is strong, comes to be called precocious, a feeling gets abroad that there is something amiss. In point of fact, everything is perfectly right, according to the law of the child's constitution, and assuming, of course, that there has been no forcing of merely average powers, in which case the precocity is a sham, and does not concern these present remarks. Precocity, to strip the word of its terrors, simply means rapid mental and emotional growth, or ripeness before the usual time—which process, in each true instance, implies nothing more dreadful than uncommon kindness on the part of Nature.

The question of dealing with precocity stands in a very different category to the foregoing, and is the main point at issue, the more because the thing itself has acquired a bad name through the frequent un wisdom of its treatment. A perfectly honest and well-meaning, but most mistaken, sentiment often prompts those upon whom a gifted child has been bestowed to stimulate the action of its faculties beyond their natural movement, and make a show of it. They submit the child to influences in themselves foreign to its specialty—the excitement, for example, of public appearance, the applause of sympathetic crowds, and such like—all of them dangerous as affecting an emotional constitution, which, in the case of a musical prodigy, must needs be highly strung. Then there are late hours, and many other circumstances abnormal to childhood, these acting upon the body, which in turn acts upon the mind with a tendency to mischief. Upon such matters we need not insist. Every reasonable person must admit the existence of a general law which sets its face against a stimulated and exhibited precociousness—a law not to be broken without risk to health and future fame.

But every rule has its exceptions, and in some cases no harm results from the showman's treatment of a wonder-child. Here it may be interesting to take a certain number of conspicuous examples, about the facts of which no question can arise. The following are a fair sample of musical precociousness —Mozart, Mendelssohn, Filtch, Crotch, Samuel Wesley, Liszt, and Schubert, of whom all but the last had more or less of the experience through which, at this moment, their successors, Josef Hofmann and Otto Hegner, are passing. Mozart died at 36, Mendelssohn at 39, Filtch at 15, Crotch at 72, Wesley at 71, Liszt at 75, and Schubert at 31. In the matter of longevity, therefore, and as far as the data above given goes, the wonder-child does not seem to be placed in a position of disadvantage, the average age of the seven deceased musicians being a little over 48. But even here those who listen carefully may distinguish a note of warning. Mendelssohn, whose extremely precocious brain was stimulated, and his delicate organisation worked upon with a reckless disregard of consequences, fell a victim to cerebral paralysis, when, according to human calculation, he had lived little more than half his days. Mozart, completely worn out, perished still earlier, and Filtch was a boy when death claimed him, as Moscheles warned the gifted lad would be the case. Out of the seven examples cited, no more than three reached the Psalmist's limit of life. But the whole seven are, so to speak, the successes of precocity against unhealthy treatment—the "fittest" who in years or fame survived the ordeal. How as to those who were unsuccessful, and either broke down utterly, or faded off into commonplace adults? We shall mention no names belonging to this category, but every observer of musical events for twenty or thirty years past can call to mind children who appeared on public platforms, were praised and flattered, attracted to themselves regards and hopes, and then, as time went on, subsided into ordinary professional life. It is interesting and saddening to go through volume after volume of musical magazines, marking the advent of youthful phenomena whose very existence is now forgotten, because the promise of their early years was not kept. Taking all evidence into account, the balance is clearly against the forcing and display of premature gifts, and the result is entirely in accordance with the conclusions of reason, which clearly argues that, though early development may be a perfectly natural and healthy process, to submit its subject to conditions of life such as are inimical to ordinary childhood is a mistake and mischievous. According to common report, the case of Josef Hofmann supplies a striking illustration of the fact just stated. The boy's musical talents are no burden to him, but because they are his he has been compelled to live a life such as the strongest child could hardly endure with impunity. The result we all see in his withdrawal from public performances, which is none the less a measure of obvious precaution because, as some statements make out, the parents have been bribed to take it.

As a conclusion to the whole matter, the wonder-child should be treated with due regard for the general fact that it is dangerous to impose upon him the hardships and excitement of a public life, and also with careful consideration of his particular case. We may not, perhaps, expect any change in the conduct of those who profit by the exhibition of precocity, but the public can do something to check the abuse of great endowments by refusing to countenance unfair demands upon them. This phase of the question is, we admit, one of difficulty, but the issues at stake are, or, at any rate, may be, so important that it is worth while to see what can be done, in a manner fair and moderate, to safeguard the interests of art. Every precocious musical child is a gift to the world, and we are all interested in preserving it from waste and mismanagement.

THE MATERIAL OF MUSIC.

IV.

THE ancient waits played pieces of sacred or solemn music, such as might be consonant with the stillness and gravity of the night. The watch called the hours and commended the sleepers and wakers to the care of Him with whom the "darkness is no darkness at all, but the night is as clear as the day."

The effect of their music must have been very impressive to those who heard it, and the pious invocation with which they ended their labours before they passed on to another quarter must have touched the heart deeply.

Those who have heard the watchman in some of the old towns in Germany, where a relic of this quaint and simple custom is still retained, always remember the fact with "a sad sweetness."

Hört ihr Leut' und lasst euch sagen die Glock' hat zehn geschlagen;
bewahrt das Feuer und auch das Licht
damit Niemand kein Schad' geschicht.
Lobet Gott den Herrn.

In Wagner's opera "Die Meistersinger" an extraordinary and powerful result is produced by the introduction of the Watchman on the scene, and the faithful reproduction of his ancient song. They will have little trouble in realising the mysterious effect of the cry of the night-guardians in the silence and gloom of the night, and the solemn warning and reminder of the flight of time such a sound produces.

Such was the character of the duty of the ancient waits in England. The modern waits only "revisit the glimpses of the moon" at the time of Christmas. They perform popular tunes in a vulgar manner upon the most vulgar of all modern instruments, the cornet-à-pistons, and "make night hideous" with their commonplace and often irritating performances. Not only do they prove that the days of chivalry are past, but that the age of romance has gone also.

It is quite possible to believe that even in those distant times, when customs such as those described were prevalent, that the sensitive may have experienced as much irritation at the repetition of common tunes as the impressionable hearer of the present day suffers; but distance lends enchantment to the view, and the atmosphere of unreality surrounding the remote scenes loses nothing, but rather gains, by speculative contemplation. Ears accustomed to the grandeur of the sounds of a modern orchestra, and influenced to serious thoughts by the sublime strains of modern composers, would be differently moved by the combinations of tone produced by some of the orchestras of the sixteenth and seventeenth centuries.

A band of flutes of different pitch, for example, that excited the admiration of the poets of the period, would be heard now with feelings in which the ludicrous would be paramount. At one of the historical concerts given during the year 1885 by the members of the Conservatoire of Brussels at the Inventions Exhibition, a slow march of the Lansquenets was performed upon an ancient set of nine flutes. The interest attached to this performance was very great. The theoretical student who had read of the matter in records of music of the past was enabled to judge practically of the effect. The tone was so droll that the audience could scarcely refrain from merriment. The sound was like some of those poor pipe organs which have survived the last century when they were probably built. It was archaic to a degree. One of the London musical critics commenting upon the event gravely described the performance and the quality of tone, and added drily that nothing was wanted but a monkey led by a string to satisfy the full expectations aroused by the sound.

A humorous, if a somewhat severe, criticism upon the music of the past.

A band of reed instruments or of strings would bring into existence a quality of tone more in accordance with that to which we are now accustomed, but the musicians of times past were conscientious and preferred to keep unmixed the several voices of the instruments known to them. Thus flutes were kept with flutes, waits with waits, and viols with viols. This was a refinement upon the ancient practice, if we may trust to the descriptions given of musical combinations at various times. We read of strings, and pipes and drums, and even bells ringing at one and the same time. It is difficult to form the slightest idea of the effect, because of the absence of more particular accounts. The scores of those days have not been transmitted to us, and so the laurels of Hector Berlioz, who is supposed to be the first to suggest such combinations upon scientific principles, may still be carried upon his brow.

One of the earliest examples of instrumental scoring is in Monteverde's "Orfeo e Eurydice," represented at Mantua in 1608. Out of this we can gather an idea of the effect the composer desired to produce. The score contains parts for two harpsichords, two lyres with thirteen strings, ten violas, three bass violas, two double basses, a harp with a double row of strings, two small French violins, with guitars, organs, a flute, clarions, and trombones.

The bass violas accompanied Orpheus, the violas Eurydice, the trombones Pluto, the small organ Apollo; and Charon, who would probably, in the present day, have been treated to the whole body of instruments to sustain his terrible utterances, was made to be content with a guitar.

The recital of incidents of the infancy of science or of manhood are always fascinating, if they are not interesting; but time would fail to trace step by step the course of musical art in the treatment of instrumental combinations in all its details in this place.

The great effects arising out of the encouragement of polyphonic vocal music as represented by the madrigal, with or without accompaniments, were manifested in various ways. The introduction of bars to mark the rhythmic divisions of the music led to the expansion of forms and admitted of a more elaborated interweaving of parts. The establishment of the opera, and the attempts made by Jacopo Peri (about 1556-1612), the poet Rinuccini, and the bold and far-seeing reformer Monteverde (1568-1643) resulted in the introduction of dramatic expression as a new factor in the scheme of music.

The old chansons or canzoni, as the polyphonic vocal compositions were called before the name of madrigal was found for them, furnished a name and a style for new forms of instrumental compositions. The improvements in the keyboard instruments admitted also of greater freedom of execution than heretofore. The limits of the song compass were, however, very rarely exceeded, and the rules of harmony were observed and the parts defined, so that even in pieces for the virginals or harpsichord it was possible to separate the harmony and distribute it among other instruments or voices. One of these canzoni, written by Johann Gaspar Kent for the organ about the year 1662, was disintegrated by Handel, and adapted to words and inserted by him as his own in the Oratorio "Israel in Egypt." The chorus is called "Egypt was glad when they departed." The only alteration Handel made was by transposing it a whole tone. The majority of these canzoni were written in fugal style or form of imitation, as may be seen in the canzona just referred to. This is in imitation by inversion. Girolamo Frescobaldi, in 1637, published a collection of his canzoni all in fugal form.

The longing desires of the composers of the sixteenth and seventeenth centuries for expansions of the recognised forms employed in music, gave rise to varieties of treatment which in turn became points of departure. The cantata, one of the then new forms of composition, arose from the improvements in recitative made by Carissimi, the immediate invention being due to a noble Venetian lady, Barbara Strozzi. She published some vocal compositions containing an admixture of air and recitative under the title of Cantate, Ariette e duette, in 1623, and intimated in the preface to the work that having invented this mixed style she had given specimens of it to the public by way of trial. Her own composition shows a certain amount of talent for the time at which it was produced, but the style she invented caught the fancy of musicians, and the cantata became an established form of composition more or less varied according to the genius of him who employed it.

The name of cantata did not find its way into this country until a century later, and then, curiously enough, it was introduced by a German, Dr. Pepusch, who published six cantatas for a single voice with accompaniments. The title of cantata is now given to any sort of short work written to sacred or secular words and composed of a mixture of solos, recitatives, choruses, &c., which, when set to sacred words, is not of sufficient length to justify the author in calling it an oratorio; or an opera, when it is set to secular words, and is not intended to be acted.

Purcell, Blow, Eccles, Weldon, Greene, Cooke, Boyce, Hayes, and other of the representatives of the English school of music, gave the title of "Ode" or "Pastoral" to their compositions of this sort, sacred or secular. One of the earliest pieces published after Dr. Pepusch in England to which this name is attached is, "A descriptive Cantata for seven voices, written for the anniversary dinner of the Royal Society of Musicians, 1835," by Tommaso Rovedino, an Italian bass singer who settled in London about the year 1790. Carissimi was the first who wrote cantatas to sacred words, and several examples of the cantatas of Astorga, Rossi, Marcello, Cesti, Alessandro Scarlatti, Gasparini, and others have been printed from time to time. Domenico Scarlatti and Pergolesi extended the form and increased the number of the movements, and Dr. Pepusch's cantatas, already referred to, are in this style. Handel wrote cantatas, and Bach's church cantatas number over two hundred. Henry Carey also wrote mock cantatas in which all the serious import of an inflated style in music was set to words of droll intention. The accompaniments to the Italian cantatas were of a nature calculated to try the skill of the performers to the utmost. Those who would accurately render these portions of some of Alessandro Scarlatti's, for example, were placed in the highest ranks of executants. Players of the present day smile at these so-called difficulties.

The music for the virginals written by Birde, Bull, Gibbons, and other composers of the Elizabethan period, exhibits a far greater artistic advance than their Church music. The same may be said generally of the works of Humfrey, Purcell, and Blow of later date, and so on throughout the generations.

The anthem, as it was formulated out of the efforts of musicians one after another, attained a shape and character which has excited the admiration even of foreigners. It is essentially an English production, and has no corresponding representative in the Church music of any other people. There are many conjectures as to the origin of the term, but none of them are completely satisfactory. Because it is performed by the singers on the two sides of the choir, the name has been stated to be derived from the Greek ἀντιφώνια; because it is said to be the flower of the service, its name has been traced to ἀνθεμῖς, various other significations have been advanced, and we are still in ignorance. We know that it exists and that some of the most distinguished English musicians have contributed to its maintenance and continuance.

It is set to words chiefly selected from the Bible, or to some serious paraphrase of the Book of Psalms, arranged in such a manner as may suit the ideas of the composer as to the most forcible method of expressing the words. There are chorus or full anthems, verse anthems, which have passages for solo voices, and "instrumental" anthems. The latter are so called because orchestral instruments are sometimes added to the organ. The musical setting of the Canticles or selected Psalms in regular use for the daily celebration is called by the general title of a Service. This includes all the music arranged for Divine worship, except the responses, which are sung according to ancient usage handed down from time immemorial, varied a little according to the "Use" of the place; the daily Psalms, which are chanted, and the anthem. Those who desire to become acquainted with the subject more fully may be referred to a little book entitled "English Church Composers."

Another peculiarly English form of musical composition is represented by what is called "The Glee." This is a composition for voices either equal or mixed, with or without accompaniment, more frequent without than with. The like uncertainty which veils the origin of the word madrigal and anthem also surrounds the term "glee." There is very little doubt in the minds of those who have given the subject their serious thoughts but that the word comes from a root which means "combination." When the word "glee," or "gle," is employed by the old poets in connection with music, this interpretation may be applied in almost every case. The "gleemen" were bodies of minstrels, jugglers, and acrobats who combined together for mutual protection and support. They were not so called because they sang glees, for the very simple reason that the "glee," as such, did not exist, and the art of singing in harmony was scarcely known, much less in practice. Besides, many of those who were often called "gleemen" had nothing whatever to do with the performance of music. The dictionary meaning given to the word "glee"—namely, "joy, mirth"—cannot be accepted as applying completely to the description of musical compositions called glees. If so they would be all of one character, joyful and merry, and would render the qualifications applied to the word by musicians altogether needless. If, however, we substitute the words "combination of voices in harmony" for the word glee to each of the following terms, the description becomes complete: Serious glee, elegiac glee, anacreontic glee, bacchanalian glee, cheerful glee, humorous glee, and comic glee. The historical predecessors of the glee were the madrigal, the round, the catch, and the canon.

The madrigal was written to be sung by many voices to a part, the parts being interwoven contrapuntal passages, one voice answering to another, the whole structure being in one movement. The round is a piece of music in which the melody is so contrived that if it is taken in sections at certain given points it should make harmony. It is, in fact, a canon in the unison. The canon (so called because it is constructed according to rule) is more scientific in character. The parts may be answered at various intervals according to the will or fancy of the composer. It may be in two, three, or more parts, and the subject may be taken at any interval. Like the round, it may be perpetual—that is to say, it may be capable of repetition an indefinite number of times; or it may be finite, or terminable after a certain number of bars. This device is more frequently employed in music to sacred words than to secular, though there are many effective canons of the latter class. The catch is a peculiar form of canon in the unison, in which the sentences are so disposed as to make the singers seemingly catch at each other's words.

One of the best examples of this musical punning is Webbe's four-part catch, the words of which are—

Would you know my Celia's charms,
Which now excite my fierce alarms?
I'm sure she's fortitude and truth,
To gain the heart of every youth.
She's only thirty lovers now,
The rest are gone, I can't tell how.
No longer Celia ought to strive,
For certainly she's fifty-five.

The humour of the catch consists in the play upon the words, each singer apparently stoutly maintaining his opinion of the age of the lady, which is variously stated to be thirty, forty-two, and fifty-five.

There is a large literature of these catches, some of them as old as the time of Shakespeare. A great quantity was produced in the reign of Charles II., but the words are unsavoury, and the cleverness of the music makes one regret that the men of genius of that age should have dragged a beautiful and pure art through such a miry way. It may seem strange when it is stated that side by side with these undesirable compositions the most popular style of vocal music was the Psalm or hymn-tune. Some writers have gone so far as to state that the glee is a combination of these ribald catches and the choral or Psalm or hymn-tune. Without endorsing this statement, it must be admitted, that collateral with the cultivation of the catch, the hymn-tune was certainly next in favour. Books containing samples of each style were printed and circulated, the latter under various titles, such as "David's Harp well tuned," the "Psalm Singer's Jewel," and so forth. Nearly all the books were prefaced with introductions containing explanations of the principles of music and the art of singing, with especial reference to the art of Psalmody.

The earliest mention of the word "glee" applied to compositions in vocal harmony, was in a book printed by John Playford in 1659, with the title of "Ayres and Dialogues." Another book, called "Catch that catch can, or the musical companion, containing Dialogues, Glee's, Ayres, Ballads, &c., some for Two, Three, and Four voyces. London: Printed by W. Godbid, for J. Playford, at his shop in the Inner Temple, 1667," was long supposed to be the first in which the term was used.

The first composition called a glee was a three-part "ayre," by Thomas Brewer, Organist of Christ Church, in Newgate Street, London, the words of which begin "Turn, Amaryllis, to thy Swain." It was not, however, until nearly a century later that the glee was a distinct and recognised form of composition. The impetus to the thoughts of English composers in this direction was given when the Catch Club, a body of noblemen and gentlemen who met for the practice and enjoyment of vocal music, was established in 1761. The prizes, which were given for catches, canons, and glees, brought into exercise one of the phases of the genius of such men as Webbe, Stafford Smith, Callcott, Danby, Spofforth, Horsley and others. The club discontinued their prizes in 1794, and the glee as a composition then began to change its character, and to foreshadow the part-song, which is now the popular form of vocal music of a simple character. Such writers as Hatton, Smart, Leslie, Macfarren, and others have produced a large number of interesting and even beautiful specimens of compositions in this class. The part-song may possibly be the stage of a development the end of which cannot now be foreseen.

The word chorus, as scholars know, comes from the Greek, and was applied to a band of singers or dancers employed on great occasions in the ancient theatres. The name is supposed by Dr. Donaldson to be derived from χóρος, the place where these exercises were performed in Sparta. Of the exact part music played in the ancient tragedies it is impossible now to determine. It is supposed that a simple rhythmical declamation analogous to chanting was performed. The accompaniments of flutes was made use of for the choruses, but whether the music was further elaborated it is impossible at this distance of time to say. All that is known is that the chorus, which was originally Terpsichorean, became Apollonian—the dance was made a song.

The chorus of voices which now forms so important a part in the vocal works of all kinds, sacred or secular, owes its development to a period within the last two hundred years. The old madrigals could scarcely be called choruses, though the first pieces sung in the early operas and oratorios were madrigal-like in form. The invention of the dramatic or operatic chorus is claimed by the French. The choruses of Lully are feeble in design and colourless as dramatic creations. Those of Campra (1660-1774) display more advanced thought and novel rhythms. Gluck invented morceaux d'ensemble, Spontini enhanced the brilliancy of instrumental colouring, while Cherubini clothed the musical outlines with graces of forms neglected by or out of the capacities of his predecessors. Meyerbeer carried on the development until his choruses became as much an integral part of the dramatic action of his operas as the soli portions. These composers were nurtured and encouraged by the French people, and although they sprang from nations other than Gallic, France claims their artistic services as her own contribution to art. With regard to the exaltation of the chorus as an element of opera, it may be mentioned that in Handel's time there were few choruses to the stage representations, the opera was for the most part a series of vocal solos. The magnificent choral effects produced by Handel in his oratorios demonstrate the mighty strength of expression which such a means can be made to assume in the hands of a giant.

The chorus singing of the present day in various parts of the nation testifies in the most forcible manner to the great advance made in musical lore and knowledge. It is not fifty years ago since it was found necessary to bring to London a small band of Yorkshire vocalists to form not only the nucleus of a chorus, as they afterwards proved to be, but at the time of their arrival the only competent chorus in the Metropolis.

The large number of choral societies now existing in and about the capital is remarkable. The greater portion of the contingent of 3,000 voices required for the Handel Festival is supplied by London, and there is scarcely a decent town in the United Kingdom which has not one or more societies capable of executing choruses with all needful nicety of tone, proper expression, and intelligent attack.

Before quitting the theme of the chorus, it will be interesting to refer to other uses of the word besides those already spoken of. In the tenth century chorus was a bagpipe, as it is described as "pellis simplex cum duobus cicutis." The connection of the word chorus with cornamusa, the Italian word, and cornemuse, the French word for a bagpipe, is also noteworthy. In the "Promptorium Parvulorum," a Latin-English dictionary of the fifteenth century, the word is used to describe a "Crowde, an instrument of musyke." The drone of the bagpipe and the unstoppable strings of the old "Crowde" becoming a sort of burden or chorus to the melody played on the strings.

THE GREAT COMPOSERS¹

By JOSEPH BENNETT.

No. XXIV.—HÉROLD (continued from page 145).

FROM the production of "Le Lapin Blanc," Hérold ceased to write in his journal other than passages which struck him in his favourite authors, and thus cut off from us the most important source of information at once accurate and interesting. This is all the more to be regretted because the closing years of the master's life were those of his greatest triumphs—those in which, conquering the world's applause, he wrote his name on tablets more imperishable than brass.

In 1826 Hérold associated himself with Planard, as musician and librettist, accepting from him a drama entitled "Marie." Every amateur knows this work by repute, but, though it still belongs to the repertory of the Opéra Comique, few English music-lovers may have been privileged to hear it. "Marie" hardly accords with the taste of the present day. It involves no commanding story of sensational interest, and the music, fitting itself to a slight and rather episodic subject, has for its leading features refinement and delicacy. But sixty years ago a sense of the idyllic was not lost, and "Marie" enjoyed extraordinary popularity from the first night of its production at the Opéra Comique (August 12, 1826) till newer works from the same pen diverted interest to themselves. Nevertheless "Marie" cannot be accepted as belonging to the composer's most characteristic productions. Hérold took a singularly long time to discover or, at all events, to illustrate his own individual style. He began by imitating whatever was most popular, and was naturally drawn into the train of Rossini by the united force of superior attraction and self-interested calculation. Little by little, however, as the French composer felt his innate strength, he emancipated himself from a somewhat ignoble situation and put forth his own powers in his own way. The music in "Marie" evidences this change unmistakably, though by no means free from the influence of Rossini, whose spirit it partially reflects, as well as the characteristics of his style. But in 1826 a touch of Rossinianism was no obstacle to popular success, and "Marie," as we have said, was promptly taken to the public heart and cherished there. First all Paris, and then all France, sang the choice bits of the work, till on every hand were heard the strains of "Une robe légère," "Batelier, dit Lisette," and "Je pars demain."

At this time Hérold had dismissed himself from the post of accompanist at the Italiens, and gone to the Grand Opéra as chorusmaster. The good fortune of "Marie" may or may not have led to further promotion, but, in any case, from chorusmaster Hérold rose to be chef du chant, "a position," says M. Jouvin, "which gave him, in association with the chef d'orchestre, the artistic direction of our first lyric stage, but absorbed his time, labour, and energies in exchange for very little glory." The constant duties of his office had the more serious effect of diverting Hérold from the work of composition, and during three years he produced only one piece, unless six ballets be counted. These appear to have given him very little trouble. He used to write them in the midst of his friends, in whose conversation he at the same time joined. Their names and dates are as follows:—"Astolphe et Joconde" (1827), "La Sonnambule" (1827), "Lydie" (1828), "La Fille mal gardée" (1828), "La Belle au Bois dormant" (1829), "Les Noces de Village" (1830). M. Jouvin has some interesting observations upon the method of these and other ballets of the period:—"The art of writing ballet music was, at that time, an art of arrangement. The melodies employed by the composer, borrowed by him from works old and new, even from the refrains of the vaudeville and the tunes of the street, had to explain the pantomime of the characters, and, by the ingenious introduction of a known theme, reveal to spectators the situation which the dancer could not depict by mere movement. In 'La Sonnambule Villageoise' Hérold happily introduced into the quarrel of the two young peasants the piquant duet of the two old women in 'Le Maçon,' and he recalled with much charm the popular melody of Amadée de Beauplan, 'Dormez donc, mes chers amours,' in the scene of sonnambulism. This framing demanded a certain art, and when the operator was a Hérold there were reasons why the tasteful ornaments of the frame should be worth as much or more than the picture. The imagination of the composer of 'Marie' was not so completely the slave of the hand occupied in making the pot-pourri as that she failed to open her wings on her own account. In following her with his eyes into space, the arranger, leaving the scissors for the pen, became an inventor, and a work of marqueterie one of inspiration. In 'La Sonnambule,' a dramatic Finale, second act, and the symphonic piece accompanying the promenade of Thérèse upon the tiles, bear the mark of great talent."

The one work, other than ballets, to which reference has been made was some incidental music to a drama, "Le Dernier jour de Missolonghi," written by Ozanneaux, and produced at the Odéon, April 10, 1828. We are told that in this the poet succeeded a little, and the musician a great deal. Hérold's contribution included an overture, often heard for years after in concert-rooms, some songs and dance measures, and a prayer. About this time—the date is variously given—Hérold received the Legion of Honour, thanks in some measure, perhaps, to Rossini, who, M. Azevedo tells us, would not accept that coveted distinction till after it had been bestowed upon his gifted fellow-artist.

In 1830 appeared, at the Théâtre Ventadour—temporary home of the Opéra Comique—a one-act piece entitled "L'Illusion." The story, by Saint-Georges and Ménessier, was gloomy, ending with a suicide, but Hérold's music made its sadness poetic, and all Paris ran to hear and to weep. M. Jouvin cynically remarks that every woman whose eyes were beautiful enough to shed tears with grace frequented the Ventadour, and copiously cried over the love and misfortunes of the heroine. Thirty-one performances of "L'Illusion" were given without a break, and the "run" of the piece extended, through the heats of summer, to seventy-nine nights—a wonderful success in the Paris of that day. Looking at this result, it may be worth while to dwell a little upon the cause. The plot of "L'Illusion" is certainly happy in its opportunities: A young diplomatist, travelling to distract his mind from disappointment in love, meets, in a Tyrolian village, with a girl who is the exact counterpart of the woman who is lost to him. In her person he worships the object of his adoration, but "on ne badine pas avec l'amour." That which is an illusion to the man is a reality to the village maiden, and at length the hero determines to marry her, though still not for her sake so much as for her likeness to another. At this juncture the lost love appears upon the scene. Death has widowed her, and she is free. Learning the situation the peasant girl takes an heroic resolution. At the wedding ceremony it is the true adored one who, prompted by the counterpart, occupies the bride's place. As for the Tyrolienne, having made happy the man to whom her heart is given, she throws herself into an abyss, and perishes. No wonder that, with such a sympathetic, poetical, and touching story, all Paris went to see the "Illusion." With regard to the music, M. Jouvin writes: "Hérold composed eight pieces for this one-act drama, all of which reveal the sure and skilful hand of a great musician. Particularly admired are the overture, treated as a pot-pourri, the introduction, picturesque and full of colour, a delicious romance, a well-developed Finale, which includes a waltz still remembered, though the work as a whole has disappeared from the scene, 'La valse de l'Illusion,' under which title it was for a long time popular."

Hérold's next venture was a failure as conspicuous as the success of "L'Illusion" was great. The composer's biographers, or some of them, contend that this was the fault of the librettist, Planard, who, falling himself, involved excellent music in ruin. Planard named his work "Emmeline," and took the story from an English novel, but, apparently, without adapting it to French tastes, which were not gratified by waiting through three acts for the softening of a flinty father's heart in the interests of true love. Among the audience at the première of "Emmeline" was the dramatist Scribe, of whom, in this connection, M. Jouvin gives some interesting particulars:—

"M. Scribe regularly attended the first representations of works by his confrères, occupying a box for which he paid; it being his rule never to ask for free admission even to the theatres whose fortune he made. Of all the spectators attracted by what is called a dramatic solemnity, M. Scribe showed himself the most attentive and the most reserved. At the back of his box, serious and silent, he followed the course of the work for the first time submitted to public judgment or caprice. Success or failure, cheers or hisses, calm or tempest among the crowd, nothing troubled or deranged his meditative repose, nothing was able to draw from his emotion or his impatience a visible sign of satisfaction or the reverse. Not that he envied the success of a confrère, or that he would hide from spectators the pleasure, enjoyed in secret, of witnessing the failure of others. He was above the petty meanness of an author's vanity, and, if he desired success for himself, he loved to see it reward his colleagues. M. Scribe visited the theatre to study his art, not for diversion. If the drama was well received, he went away without saying a word; if it failed, not on account of the subject, but because of indifferent workmanship, he would remark, on leaving his place, 'That is a piece which I shall reconstruct.'"

Scribe saw just such a piece in Planard's "Emmeline." He wrote one of his own on the same story, brought it out at the Gymnase, and obtained a great success.

Of the "Emmeline" music, only an orchestral fragment survives; this being played at the Opéra Comique, between the second and third acts of "Marie," whenever that opera is performed. Hérold's French admirers are distinctly of opinion that, if revived, "Emmeline" would have a chance of favour, and one of them demands, "Why allow a masterpiece of grace and sentiment to sleep in the library of a theatre?"

In 1830 Miss Smithson, the English actress, re-appeared in Paris, to court once more the favour shown by the French public during her tour with Macready two years before. It is said that Miss Smithson failed to obtain success in England after her triumph in France, and some Gallic writers are unkind enough to insinuate that insular pride would not cry "ditto" to French judgment. The matter is not worth discussing now. Enough that Miss Smithson went back to Paris, and appeared at the Ventadour (May 11, 1830) in a piece called "L'Auberge d'Auray." This appears to have been written to provide the English artist, who could not play in French, with a pantomime part designed to show the eloquence of her gestures and facial expression. She had to portray the anguish of a peasant wife whose husband is tried and condemned to death on suspicion of harbouring a Vendean leader. Dramatically, the experiment failed, but some incidental music written by Hérold and Carafa presented a redeeming feature, and the piece made at any rate a succès d'estime. Twelve months later Miss Smithson married Hector Berlioz and began a matrimonial career not unlike, in sad disappointment, her experience on the stage.

We now reach the most glorious period of Hérold's life—that in which he gave "Zampa" to the world and followed up his masterpiece with "Le Pré aux Clercs." Like most other composers of opera, Hérold found his greatest difficulty in the obtaining of good libretti. Of the many new dramas submitted to him few pleased, till at last the master began turning his attention towards old subjects, among others that of "Don Juan." That Mozart had already dealt with it does not seem to have prevented Hérold from at least entertaining the idea of trying his own hand upon the story. At any rate, he spoke about it to the dramatist Mélesville, who, glad of a chance of appearing as Hérold's co-labourer, set to work immediately upon a libretto embodying the principal incidents introduced by Da Ponte into the book for Mozart, but, of course, under new conditions which, as "Zampa" must be familiar to musical readers, we need not stop to indicate. Hérold approved the drama as thus prepared and began the music with zeal.

At this time the Opéra Comique (in lodgings at the Théâtre Ventadour) was in a very bad way. Collapse and ruin so stared the enterprise in the face that it became for the director a matter of serious concern to find a work adapted to please the public. But this unfortunate person missed his chance when Mélesville read to him the libretto of "Zampa." It did not please him, he rejected it, and went on to inevitable catastrophe. Hérold, who was present, put the unfortunate MS. in his pocket, saying, "The subject suits me, my music is three parts finished; when you want a success to save your theatre you can come and find me." When the non-perceptive manager had come to hopeless grief, it was resolved to make a special effort and, if possible, resuscitate the fortunes of the Opéra Comique. France could not, for very shame, allow them to remain in such a state, and incur the reproach of neglecting a peculiarly national form of art. Consequently, the famous Dr. Véron was placed in charge of the Grand Opéra, the man he superseded, M. Lubbert, being transferred to the Ventadour, and commissioned to raise that house from its low estate. Lubbert and the authorities behind him set about their task in good earnest. Among other steps, they brought Valentino from the Grand Opéra as chef d'orchestre, increased the orchestra till it numbered eighty performers, and announced for the opening night a new opera by Hérold, entitled, "Zampa, ou la Fiancée de Marbre." No one knew what would be the result, but on all hands men felt that the life or death of the Opéra Comique was involved. On the morning of the opening one journal said:—"To-day the grand inauguration will take place. . . . 'Zampa, ou la Fiancée de Marbre,' is the work destined to effect a great act of resurrection or sudden death; for it cannot be concealed that, after so many promises, if the result disappoint all is over for a long time with a theatre which the public can neither love nor avoid in moderate measure." So said they all on that momentous third day of March, 1831, and it is easy to believe that Hérold felt weighed down by an immense load of responsibility. He carried the burden, not of his own fortunes merely, but those of an historic stage. What wonder if he staggered under them? or if he felt buoyant and light-hearted when Paris thundered its approval of the new work, lifted the composer to the skies, and temporarily saved the Opéra Comique from ruin?

It is no part of our purpose to criticise here an opera so well-known as "Zampa," but it may be worth while to show how some of Hérold's contemporaries and countrymen regarded it. M. Scudo wrote: "The side of this work that stands open to criticism is, as nearly always with Hérold, confusion of styles. The austere and sober phrase of 'Joseph' (Méhul) is found in company with Italian bravura; the chansonette disperses with its importunate cock-crow all the phantoms evoked from the supernatural. Mozart, Méhul, Weber, Rossini, Auber—how many more?—may be found in the hybrid formation of this superb monster. You find in 'Zampa' the echo of all the inspiration, of all the great voices of the time. Under the mobile structure of that orchestra, so full of presentiments and mysteries, you distinguish Weber; those duets, those Venetian-coloured Finales, conceived, worked with the vigorous authority of a master, speak to you of Rossini, while here and there the small details, the grace, the spirit, the lively and piquant features murmur in your ears the names of Boieldieu and Auber. Every instant one regrets that a man capable of producing the art of others with such intensity of reflection, such supreme ability—a man of such rare talent—did not learn to speak for himself. It is, they say, because Hérold had no personality. Invention failed him; his opéra-comique, more grand than that of Auber, is but a reduction of grand opera." Now let us hear M. Jouvin on the same subject: "That which ranks 'Zampa' among the rare and privileged productions, the authority of which establishes itself more and more, is that all the divisions of art are brought into equilibrium. The brain, the heart, and the hand of the composer are fraternally associated to produce a thing complete and perfect. Hérold's melody, flowing in abundant stream, is by turns passionate and light, it comes from lofty elevations or mysterious profundities, and if a bright ray of sunshine makes it scintillate upon the stones where it babbles, never does a vulgar phrase throw itself into the current of pure originality, and affect its transparency. The harmony, of sustained power and elegance, taking in some sort, under a competent hand, all the forms and folds of sonority, proves a creative gift, even in the art of combining groups of chords; the shock of modulations, in appearance the most violent, passing into harmonic resolutions of incomparable sweetness. One is surprised that such an aggregation of notes, which seem to do violence to sound, should be a caress to the ear. . . . In 'Zampa' one runs through the entire gamut of sentiments and passions; all is contrast in that production at once masterly and charming, and in which the style of the musician is nevertheless an admirable unity." We have now heard the critic and the eulogist speak, each representing a section of the musical public, to whom "Zampa" submitted itself for judgment. As to the opinion of the present time, it can hardly be said actively to exist. "Zampa" has not been heard in England, we believe, since its production at the Gaiety theatre many years ago, and our concert-rooms have only the overture. But an opera so famous, about which every amateur has heard, and concerning which he knows something, can hardly have disappeared for ever. It will come up again some day and make the name of Hérold once more familiar.

With regard to the immediate results of "Zampa," we take the following from Scudo's Musiciens du Passé, du Présent, et de l'Avenir. "'Zampa,' from its first appearance at the Ventadour, had not the success which is commonly reported. More fame than cash—such was the moral of the comedy. In France and elsewhere Hérold's renown grew, but he gained little in fortune. It was only later that his music, however honourably received, became for the Parisian public an object of attraction. There are musicians who succeed during their lifetime; others see their star rise in the heavens only when they have reached the abode of Pluto. Halévy dead, it was everybody's business to forget him. Of his numerous works it is doubtful if more than a few friends know their names. 'La Juive,' which is better than nothing, endures at the Opéra, but not a note of 'Guido et Ginevra,' 'Charles VI. 'Le Juif Errant,' and 'La Magicienne' has survived. He left behind him the score of 'Noé'—who has troubled about it? Speak to men whom this matter concerns, and they will answer, like Louis XIV., 'Otez-moi ce magot de devant les yeux?' On the other hand, Hérold is, to-day, thought much of by all of us. If life neglected him sometimes, death did wonders in his favour."

A month after the production of "Zampa," Hérold's connection with the Grand Opéra was broken off by the director, Dr. Véron, as a measure of economy. The institution, though receiving an enormous annual allowance from the State, had been for a long time getting deeper and deeper into debt, till at last the time came for authoritative action of some sort. Under these circumstances, Véron was installed as director, with orders to adjust expenditure to revenue and restore the fortunes of the house. The Doctor, in taking the post, bound himself to respect the engagements entered into with artists by his predecessors, but it happened, in the case of Hérold, that his contract as maître du chant was verbal and not committed to writing. Véron at once seized the opportunity to reduce expenses, and the maître du chant received his dismissal. Hérold, however, was not the man to put up with treatment of this kind. He promptly appealed to the courts of justice, which took nine months to consider the matter, and then decided in his favour. The decree went forth that the first maître du chant at the Opéra must be treated as a premier sujet, that there was an implied contract between Hérold and the institution, that the dismissed official must be reinstated for a term of ten years and a-half, at a salary of 5,000 francs, and that the director must pay 3,750 francs as salary for the nine months of deprivation. This, it must be admitted, was not exactly a feat of economy on the part of the illustrious Doctor, who took care not to say anything about it in the Memoirs which, some thirty years ago, all Europe read with amusement. In justice to Véron, M. Jouvin points out that, though he was hard upon the maître du chant, he could be considerate to the composer, and saved "Le Pré aux Clercs" at a critical moment by lending one of his artists to take the place of a recalcitrant.

Once more Hérold became concerned with the fortunes of the Opéra Comique, to which "Zampa" did but temporary service. The director, Lubbert, was active and able, but, according to one witness, the institution had fallen into hopeless decay, while the public avoided the Ventadour as a house which had become declassé. Six months after "Zampa" the affairs of the theatre had reached a crisis, and again something had to be done on the principle of "kill or cure." Lubbert then bethought him of a great work suited to the taste of the day—sombre in character and making a strong appeal to the imagination and emotions of the audience. This was not opéra-comique by any means, but what could a poor director do? A man who has gone under water twice cannot afford to be particular as to the means of keeping himself afloat. Lubbert, in pursuance of his scheme, invited the co-operation of Scribe and Castil-Blaze, by one or both of whom the story of the notorious poisoner, Marquise de Brinvilliers, was selected for treatment. Ten pieces of music had to be written for the drama, and, there being no time to spare, the task was divided among nine composers: Cherubini, Berton, Paër, Boieldieu, Auber, Carafa, Batton, Blangini, and Hérold. Of course the music was a mixture of styles, and as a musical play "La Marquise de Brinvilliers" attracted only the curious. Neither did it succeed as a drama. First performed on October 31, 1831, it ran, if running can be spoken of in such a connection, till December 9, when the house closed. M. Lubbert had shot his bolt, it missed, and there was no course open but to shut the doors.

In January, 1832, the Ventadour re-opened with M. Laurent as director. He, too, was compelled to try drama, and he, too, failed; his tenancy of the unfortunate theatre lasting six months only. What to do now for the poor Opéra Comique? Obviously, some said, to change the theatre, and this advice prevailed. A little theatre, the Nouveautés (now the Vaudeville), was taken, and there, in September, 1832, the second stage of France was set up with very few hopes and many fears. Apparently the institution was doomed, but there could be no harm in another struggle. Hérold at once began writing for it, and, in October, he and Scribe produced a little piece "La Médecine sans Médecin." This, however, was only a sop thrown to an impatient director clamorous for novelty. It answered the purpose, proved to be a success, and assisted in keeping the house open till the composer had finished an opera to be known as "Le Pré aux Clercs"—a masterpiece destined to revive the faded glories of the Opéra Comique and complete the edifice of Hérold's fame.

BY FRANZ GRENINGS.

ON Wood-wind instruments differences in colour or timbre of notes run or group themselves very differently to those on brass instruments, which proves again distinctly that Key Colour cannot be generalised. On any wood instrument the lowest note stands out in richness against all the rest, as the sound emanates solely from the end opposite the mouthpiece (bell end), whereas with all other notes the direction of sound is divided between the bell end and some open lateral holes, whether they determine the length of the vibrating air column in producing fundamental notes, or whether they are opened merely to help the division of the air column at one of the loops, necessary to produce with ease the harmonics or upper partials required. Again, the lowest octave stands out, all its notes being fundamental notes; the notes above are partials of those fundamental ones at higher wind pressure. These may, as in brass instruments, be produced as higher partials of lower fundamental or as lower partials of higher fundamental notes, with a very slight difference as to timbre; e.g., on a

harmonic of ; as fourth harmonic of (the usual way); or as third harmonic of

In a similar way  may be produced as seventh partial of ; as sixth partial of ; as fifth partial of ; or as fourth partial of the latter being the way generally employed by opening in addition the  hole, to form a loop

at one-fourth of the column of air employed. Double reed instruments, like oboe, Cor Anglais, and bassoon, are similar, but the latter two give further illustrations of what I said about the effect of additional resistance to overcome, when speaking about bends in cornet and trombone, as it will be found the peculiar character of Cor Anglais is more pronounced in notes where the vibrating air column reaches below the knee, and on a bassoon the real "funny" notes are to be found on the long joint, owing mainly to the wind being forced round that small acute angle at the bottom of the butt. The single reed instrument, the clarinet, is similar and differs at the same time, as unlike on the others, the second partial or octave of any fundamental note will not speak, whereas with the help of the thirteenth key (for a loop) the third partial or twelfth of any fundamental note is easily got; hence the fingering of the third partials (or twelfths) corresponds with that of their fundamentals—

whereas on flute and double reed instruments the fingering of the second partials (or octaves) corresponds with that of their fundamental notes, from which it is clear that any distinctions between scales based on the mixture of fundamental notes and lower and higher partials on a clarinet, would widely differ from those on the other wood-wind instruments; moreover, the character of a register, say the third partials (medium register), will be found to lie on a C clarinet from ; on a B flat clarinet from ; on an A clarinet from on an E flat clarinet from  when measured by one pitch. Where then to look for fixed or absolute Key Colour in wood-wind?

Of wind instruments not à bouche, those without reservoir (or worked by direct hand pressure), such as concertinas in general, melodeons, and all kindred instruments, do not deserve much consideration, as they are, as a rule, very imperfectly made and tuned (or rather, tuned out of tune); any piece will give a being of only ordinary sensitiveness the "horrors," whatever key the said character piece may be played in. On a so-called Celestial concertina, this effect is whimsically multiplied, as each note is provided with two tongues, tuned with malice aforethought at a difference. I sincerely hope that the inventor had no authority for christening them thus, and that they are not shadows cast before coming events. I would except well made English concertinas; but they need not be considered separately, as any performance on them is like a melody only, played on a harmonium with the expression stop drawn, as far as our discussion is concerned.

Of wind instruments with a reservoir, we have the harmonium and the organ. The harmonium without the expression stop resembles an organ, as the wind is forced evenly and equally through all open valves, steel springs acting on the reservoir. With the expression stop pulled out deductions as to Key Colour would not be quite reliable, as the performer may vary the wind pressure at will and might reverse the character of two keys by clever manipulation in blowing. No such deception would be possible on the organ, and here we have at last an instrument which would fully, clearly, and conclusively prove my views, were it not for a slight difference arising from the impossibility of perfect tuning. Three agents are at work in organ playing: (1) a man at the back to pump air; (2) a man at the front to allow the said air to escape (more or less judiciously); but (3) the real player or motor lies on the top of the wind reservoir, an innate mass of lumps of pig iron and weights, supplying a constant and equal force to all notes whose valves are opened, whichever chords or scales they may belong to; major and minor keys are supplied alike; D flat receives the same treatment as C, whether in a Missa solennis or in a Requiem; and the result is, that all artificial scale colour is absent, leaving only Nature's regular up and down gradation, corresponding with excitement and depression, as set forth in THE MUSICAL TIMES of November, 1886, page 651. Any organist would, on a festive day, transpose a hymn which, on ordinary days, he played in A, instinctively and without hesitation (that is to say, if he can transpose) a semitone or a tone higher, and not a fourth lower to E, said to be the most brilliant key. On a mournful occasion any organist would just as naturally transpose the same hymn down to A flat or G; in fact, were the organist guided in the choice of key by the erratic characteristics laid down in some books instead of by his natural instinct, he might run the risk of a proposal being made by the congregation to have his cranium examined.

A parallel or similarity between, say, piano and organ, as to Key Colour, is therefore out of the question; faulty construction, however, might bring it about, if, for instance, an organ builder bored the holes in the top of the wind chest unequally or out of proportion, that is to say, if he made the holes for the sharps smaller than those for every next higher natural.

Now as to the slight discrepancy mentioned before. It is not the tuning in "equal temperament," but the impossibility of accomplishing it to perfection, that leaves a very slight chance of differences being observed even in the organ, by an extraordinary good and critical ear; but here again the difference in starting points between English and German tuners will prove that any possible deductions are not adherent to a fixed pitch. The former tune from C, the latter from A, and therefore slight but unavoidable traces of the so-called "wolf" in a given key on an organ tuned from C must be found in an organ tuned from A in a key a minor third lower. If in tuning an organ the distance of an octave could be divided as mathematically correct into twelve semitones as a foot measure is divided into twelve inches, all chance of scale colour would cease; e.g., all chords built up, say, out of a perfect fifth, a perfect fourth, and a major third, would be exactly alike in total and part intervals and consequent effect whichever note on the keyboard we may start from, whether it be C, G, C, E, or D flat, A flat, D flat, F, or any other, the same as it would be immaterial from which inch-mark on a yard measure we start measuring seven, and five, and four inches from.

How, then, have all those gushing effusions as to fixed characteristics in the various scales come about, when not two instruments can be measured with the same tape? When some slight difference in a few scales, caused through uneven force applied or through faulty tuning has been detected somewhere, the observer, I am afraid, has gone out of his way in search of more, and in many cases the wish to find something may have been the father of the thought of having found it. Such enthusiasts would get more satisfaction by setting to work the reverse way—namely, they might draw up an emotional list first, and then, with the help of a clever mechanic, have an instrument made in which the notes would group themselves into the various combinations calculated to make one feel inclined classically, royally, intensely melancholy, &c., "to order"!

Having reviewed the different classes of instruments as regards timbre and distinctive qualities of notes inter se on the self-same instrument, we have found differences to exist on various instruments; but at the same time we have also seen that they widely differ as to location and grouping in the different classes, which makes it clear, I think, that it is nonsense to talk of key or scale colour or characteristics generally in music, and without mentioning always and in each case the particular sound-producer referred to.

I had nearly forgotten an instrument of importance, because it may be considered the father of harmonium and organ, although it has preserved its archaic form and semi-barbarous character intact up to the present day; it is a band in itself, and so unique in every way that it cannot be classed with any other, and that anything and nothing may be deduced from it. I mean the bagpipes. It is unique in its construction, as, different to its offsprings, the squeezing process is performed in a more natural (con amore) manner by the arm, the Northumbrian using even both arms, the left to squeeze the feeder, the right to squeeze the reservoir. A kind of sentry's walk seems to be necessary to assist manipulation, and that may be the reason that bagpipes are not or cannot be introduced in mounted regiments. Its effect is always very remarkable, as it allows of no half-heartedness amongst its hearers: as soon as the "wail" makes the multitude aware of what is in store for them, they straightway divide into two very decided sections, the one whose ears are drawn (quite in a pastoral like manner) forward towards the sound producer, the other who looks for exits and return tickets. Strange to say, instead of introducing the instrument itself into the orchestra, composers have hitherto contented themselves with orchestral imitations (as in "Dame Blanche," "Dinorah," &c.); but the best of them are left far behind the original, which is inimitable; its notes do not form any diatonic scale whatever; one note lies in the neighbourhood of F or F sharp, but is neither one nor the other. I am therefore at a complete loss how and whereabout to search for traces of Key Colour; perhaps some kind reader from across the border will give me a hint and a start. A Highland Concerto, or, to make up for lost time, a triple Concerto with orchestral accompaniments, would indeed be a novelty in every way. Rehearsal and tuning might be dispensed with, as no amount of them could make even the scales correspond; the soloists might keep in motion by pacing up and down the platform, and easily add the distance effects by occasional walks behind the chorus, the organ, or along the corridors. No doubt the peculiarities of such a combination, and the difficulty to appreciate the merits of the instrument, hitherto made composers shrink from undertaking the difficult task; but now, that at last a national Scottish composer has arisen, we may perhaps look forward to the gap being filled up at an early date. Such a performance might supply abstract Key Colour advocates with very valuable additions to their characteristic vocabulary, and make them imagine that they stand on the brink of the millennium.

MDLLE. JANKA WOHL'S RECOLLECTIONS OF LISZT.*

OF the writing and making of books about Liszt there is no end. Few, however, have done justice to the subject or reflected credit on their compilers. To the general run of these productions there have, fortunately, been exceptions, and in that select category the volume recently put forth by Mdle. Janka Wohl undoubtedly deserves to be ranked. This gifted lady had known Liszt from her childhood, and towards the close of his life acted for several years in the capacity of his private secretary. The intimate and special relationship which thus existed between her and Liszt afforded her opportunities which she has turned to good, but, let us add, to legitimate account in her "Souvenirs d'une Compatriote," of which an English translation has recently been issued by Messrs. Ward and Downey. She might obviously have made her pages a great deal more piquant had she so wished it, but her reserve has in no way impaired the attractiveness and value of her work. Her aim has been to portray Liszt not en grande tenue, but as he appeared to an inner circle of tried friends; to record his views on art and literature, his estimates of eminent contemporaries, and, without attempting fully to describe his individuality—a task she compares to that of trying to reflect the universe in a drop of water—to illustrate some of its more salient traits by characteristic acts and sayings. Into the irregularities of his life she has no morbid desire to pry, nor does her veneration lead her to palliate them as "noble antinomianisms." Exceptional himself, he always created exceptional surroundings; in fact, the ascendancy that he exerted over his fellow men and women was, in her opinion, that of an unconscious sorcerer, who often suffered from the effects of his own magic.

The reader of these pages cannot fail to be struck at the remarkable acuteness of Liszt's insight in matters outside his own immediate province. The sudden fermentation of the Russian intellect had a great attraction for him, and his views as to the future of Russian art and literature are expressed in language of the greatest felicity. "Russia," he said, in the course of a conversation with Mdle. Wohl, "has more intellectual horizons still to discover than lands to explore." And again, "their originality is deep rooted in the soil; it is an emanation of the land, and is inseparable from its snows, its steppes, and from the way its sons look upon life and death." The analogy between Russian works of art and their climate, with its long weary winters and short sudden summers, is worked out very happily in another passage. But as Mdle. Wohl charmingly puts it, "no matter what chord was touched, one was sure to hear him vibrate." As the sands of his life ran lower, he seemed to reach that "prophetic strain" which our own poet tells us is the outcome of long experience. A discussion of the "Greville Memoirs" led him to condemn such works as tending to destroy the fascination of the past which we love to idealise. He himself had kept such a diary once for awhile, and stumbling on it years afterwards was horrified at its bitterness. "Only the handwriting could convince me that I had really written those unpardonable lines. The blows fell thick under my pen, and the oddest thing is that these notes in no way expressed my opinion of men and things, nor did they coincide with my character. They were nothing but flashes of humour, of irony, of temper, or of enthusiasm, mad and ill-natured ideas which did not spare even my friends, and a résumé of trivialities, the importance of which had been exaggerated by my contact with them. . . . Memoirs written from day to day will always give a more or less false idea of their author and of the times they are supposed to describe. After this experience of my own I distrust these sort of books; they are, as a rule, not nearly so true as they would have us believe. Greville was bilious, fond of eating, and vindictive; and every time he got an attack of indigestion the world appeared to him under an aspect as false as it was unsightly."

Few men of letters possessed the gift of summarising a character so concisely as Liszt. What can be more pointed or picturesque than the following comments on the career and character of Wagner: "Wagner the idolised, the friend of the King of Bavaria, in no way resembles the Wagner who knocked at my door at Weimar. Then he was a man driven to bay, a Christopher Columbus in despair, who had seen and touched this new world which nobody would believe existed. He carried the treasures of it in his brain and he was looked upon as a madman. His inspiration was contagious and he had an unequalled power of making fanatics. He was a born reformer and neither blood nor fire would have daunted him. Still, there never was a man who worked against his own chances in the way Wagner did. His genius triumphed, so to speak, in his own despite, for nobody put so many spokes in his wheels as Richard Wagner." Again, in regard to Wagner's abuse of his prosperity, Liszt remarked, "in the matter of glory, Wagner had fasted almost continuously for thirty years. Now fasting weakens, and when glory at last did come to him, not drop by drop like to other mortals, but in a flood, he was not strong enough to receive it calmly." So elsewhere, in dealing with the same topic, he said: "When the grand reaction in his destiny suddenly took place, and the King of Bavaria sent for him, Wagner must have thought himself mocked by a dream. Cinderella's godmother had come to life again for his benefit. . . . If he had himself created a Mæcenas on his own lines, he could not have succeeded better. I believe the fatal influence was reciprocal. On the one side the caprices of Wagner would have drained the treasures of Golconda, on the other the King's freaks egged on the schemes of Wagner. They spurred each other on and worked miracles."

Liszt's views on the encouragement which government should give to art are worth quoting: "The opera, the only musical institution seriously and effectively subsidised, in no way gives composers of other kinds the necessary emulation. So their works, together with their genius—if they have any—remain in their portfolios in face of the difficulties, often insurmountable, they meet with in getting themselves heard. ‘And without emulation there is no art,’ says Schumann. . . . The philharmonic societies are insufficient, for they must in their own interests cater for the public taste. From time to time they timidly hazard a novelty, never showing the courage to repeat it if, at the first representation, it does not succeed in captivating the audience. Schumann used to get furious if any one said ‘This was a success: this was not.’ ‘As if there was nothing more important than pleasing people!’ he used to say. . . . People generally forget that many works, and often the best, need to be thoroughly understood in order to be appreciated. That is why, when I hear a first performance, I always feel as if I was present when sentence was being passed in a criminal court.”

Another point on which Liszt’s opinion will be heard with interest is the decadence of the art of singing. In reply to an enquiring friend, he declared that “The quality of voices has deteriorated, or rather, talent is not so conscientiously trained and cultivated as formerly. The arts also have their flowering season: that of exceptional voices seems to me to be on the wane, not so much, perhaps, in opera, as in private life. I often think, at Rome and Weimar, that the arts, by becoming general, lose their intensity. The whole style of playing has changed—the dash of the old days has gone; people are interested in too many things. That certain ‘poetry of aristocratic drawing-rooms,’ as Chopin called the manner of the Faubourg Saint-Germain, no longer exists. It was the amateurs who were the chief ornaments of the salons, those forcing-houses of art. What a crowd of amateurs there were from 1830 to 1850, whose talent could well be matched with that of the artists of the first flight! What music we heard in Paris, Geneva, and Milan; music of dilettanti, against which we ‘in the profession’ had little chance! And particularly the ladies: the Comtesses Samoyloff, Potocka, Jamaglio, and many others of more recent date, whose superb voices, cultivated for pleasure, would nowadays be worth fortunes. Julia Samoyloff was a nightingale. In no other voice have I found that incomparable quality of tone.”

The passages we have quoted, and many others, help one to realise the justice of George Eliot’s remark that Liszt’s conversation was delightful, and that no one could tell a story so well. Indeed, the references to him in her letters, written from Weimar in 1854, are quite effusive in their admiration. She notices, amongst other things, the originality and point of his replies. He played for her, and for the first time in her life she witnessed a real inspiration. “There was nothing strange or immoderate in his attitude. He handled the instrument with ease and quietness. His lips were closed, his head a little thrown back, and his face looked simply sublime. When the music expressed rapture, a sweet smile wandered over his lips like a sunbeam on the water. When triumph was the keynote, his nostrils distended and a heavenly light seemed to play on his features. Nothing small or artificial came to spoil the picture. Why didn’t Ary Scheffer paint him at such a time, instead of representing him in the form of one of the three magi? And yet Scheffer’s picture is a grand conception.”

Of George Eliot, on the other hand, Liszt had a high opinion. Plain though she was, he admits that she had “du charme.” “She seemed to absorb like a sponge everything she saw and heard. Her long ill-favoured face assumed an expression of attention so rapt that it became positively interesting.”

Liszt, as is well known, shone in the art of repartee, which was seldom bitter except when his dignity as an artist was assailed. At a Court soirée the Czar began talking loudly during his performance. “All of a sudden Liszt stopped dead, and left the piano. The Czar was puzzled, and approaching the master, said to him, ‘Why have you stopped playing?’ ‘When the Emperor speaks one ought to be silent,’ was the Machiavellian answer of the wounded artist.” When the Princess Metternich asked him, in the presence of a great many people, “Is business pretty good, Doctor?” he replied, “It is only bankers and diplomatists who do a good business.” Once at Florence a lady of rank, renowned for her eccentricity, suddenly assailed him as follows: “Can you tell me, Mr. Canon, what were the names of the sons and daughters of Job?” At these words consternation appeared on the faces of all. But the master, in no wise embarrassed, drew himself up, and said: “Madam, do you wish me to skate? I assure you I am not a skater.” It must not be implied from this that Liszt was ashamed of his cloth. Far from it. He was most rigorous and exact in the performance of all religious duties, and the intimate terms on which he associated with the present Pope and his predecessor—who called him his dear Palestrina—are quite enough to negative such an assumption. Just as Liszt was a universal favourite with musicians, so he had the gift of enjoying intellectual intercourse with thinkers of every shade. Personally he seems to have been proof against all assaults on his faith. “His soul,” says Mdle. Wohl, “seemed like a diamond which the rust of doubt could never tarnish. The sacred fire which animated him brought him so near to his divine origin that no philosophy could alter the intuition which drew him towards the Eternal.”

The relations which prevailed between Liszt and his mother-country are treated in very interesting fashion by Mdle. Wohl. Reared in a German-speaking district of Hungary, and transplanted in childhood to Paris, he never learnt to speak his native tongue. Hence the jealous and spiteful attacks made on one who, in a hundred practical ways, proved himself a devoted patriot. As Mdle. Wohl says, she only needed to hear him play one of his Hungarian Rhapsodies to be convinced that he was “blood of our blood, and that if his lips did not speak our language his soul spoke it all the better.” His benevolence, which was proverbial, and which he concealed as carefully as if it had been a crime, was constantly exercised for the benefit of struggling compatriots. But in his generosity Liszt was a true cosmopolitan. His own rose-strewn path had only made him the more capable of sympathising with those who had found the road to fame arduous and thorny. His favourite pupils were of all nationalities—Russian, Hungarian, French, German, and English. This wide range of sympathy had its drawbacks as well as its advantages. “Liszt,” as his present biographer writes, “was not intended for a domestic life. His hearth was the world, and he found his home in the altars which were raised to him wherever he set his foot. The incense which was burned around him rendered him incapable of appreciating for long the sweet pleasures of a home, the monotony of which would soon have bored him.” It was a favourite saying of his that “the soul of an artist ought to be like a lonely rock, surrounded and often buried beneath the waves, but, in spite of that, immovable.” And yet, according to Mdle. Wohl, it was the imperious desire to mingle once more in the mid-current of life which drove him, at the close of his life, to revisit the scenes of his former triumphs. The bourgeois atmosphere of Buda-Pesth bored him, the oriental dolce far niente of his compatriots was worse even than the assiduities of the clan of Leo-Hunter. In fact, Liszt was at home in Hungary, and his restless spirit yearned to escape once more from such tranquil domesticity. And so "for one last time he put on the purple of his glory and then expired amid the iridescent fires of a gorgeous sunset."

A NEW terror for seafaring men is looming in the distance. We do not mean that the questions put to young candidates for the navy are likely to be so searching in the future that few aspirants for a "life on the ocean wave" can hope to pass the ordeal, but that a subject hitherto unconnected with nautical affairs may be included in the list already sufficiently severe to tax the powers of the bravest. We know that the "eye test" is an important item at these examinations, but to this it is now proposed to add the "ear test." A correspondent of the Globe, complaining that the foghorn, as at present constituted, emits sounds "hardly of the quality which a musician would approve," suggests that its utterances might be made intelligible by being so arranged as to form the common chord (C E G C). The "dominant (G)," he says, "might intimate that the vessel was steering to the north; G C that she was bearing eastward; G C E that she was making for the west; and G C E C that she was going south." We can scarcely imagine that for the carrying out of this idea it would be essential that sailors should trouble themselves about the meaning of a "common chord" or a "dominant," but it would be awkward indeed if, in the excitement of a fog, a question should arise as to which was the true signal given. G C, for example, means that a vessel is steering to the east, but the addition of the final E that she is going westward; and if this note were heard by some and not by others, it might lead to something more disastrous than a collision of opinion. Again, either from the fault of the instrument or the performer, it might sometimes happen that the required sound could not be produced. Most of us know the story of the conductor of a theatrical band who, on being told by a member of the orchestra that there was a note in the oboe part which he could not play, shouted out "Never mind, sir, play a note that you can play." The ears of a few might certainly be offended by such a proceeding on the part of an oboe performer at a country theatre; but the lives of hundreds might be sacrificed by a similar action on the part of a foghorn performer at sea.

THE noble and distinguished art exercised by the "claque" in France and elsewhere takes a less dignified form in London. In Paris the whole force is organised in a business-like way, and the several professors find special occupations according to their talents. There are the "bisseurs," or those whose duty it is to demand repetitions; there are the "rieurs," the laughers, whose business it is to titter in specified places, or to break out into noisy guffaws as occasion requires; there are the "pleureurs," who drop the briny tear, or shake the manly bosom with the bursting sob, and other sub-sections of the emotions, all evidences of an artistic division of labour. The occupation is recognised by performers, managers, and authors, and provided for accordingly. In London, where the "profession" has no organisation at present, it would appear as though a few enterprising creatures were desirous of introducing a similar custom in places of entertainment. Unfortunately, they have not laid their plans with any degree of taste and judgment like their Gallic prototypes. They have no "bureau" where these matters can be amicably settled beforehand, and where the "receptions" can be provided for according to a definite plan, and their own "douceur," their "sweetener," agreed upon. Our metropolitan reformers wait at stage doors with doubled fists and thick sticks ready to employ either or both upon the persons who decline their services. Their plan is inartistic, and although it bears the pretty and poetical name of "chirruping," suggestive of the feathered warblers of the grove, it is apt to cause the "chirrupers" to be deprived of their liberty for a time. In the intervals of rest between the period of practical geological studies and the disintegration of tarred rope, occupations suggested and enforced by a benign legislation, the "chirruper" may reflect upon the disadvantages of improperly developed schemes of encouragement for the benefit of artistic designs and expositions of talents, so as to enforce their acceptance by other means than the "argumentum ad baculum."

FROM Paris we hear of oratorio performances in that city, with "appropriate costumes and scenery," Haydn's "Creation," and Gounod's "Tobias" being mentioned as amongst the compositions selected for representation. Without stopping to inquire what may be considered "appropriate costumes and scenery" for the first-named work, we cannot but record our conviction that, both in an artistic and religious sense, such performances are a fatal mistake. We believe, and indeed have already stated our belief in these columns, that the "dramatic oratorio" is gradually gaining favour, even with English audiences—as may be fully evidenced by the success of Mackenzie's "Rose of Sharon" and Cowen's "Ruth"—but a "dramatic oratorio" is merely a sacred composition for voices and orchestra, moulded in a "dramatic," instead of what may be termed an "epic," form. Place such a work upon the stage, with the accessories of scenery and dresses, and the true intention of the composer is utterly defeated; for the events and localities he has striven to suggest by the powerful aid of music become themselves the primary attraction, the musical colouring being merely accepted as accompanying and intensifying the action. In addition to this, it may be urged that the religious feeling, which it should be the aim of all oratorios to glorify becomes lowered by association with the stage and its surroundings; the bodily presentation of scriptural personages being only suited for an audience incapable of appreciating music in its highest form. So far from being a step in advance, then, the performance of an oratorio upon the stage is unquestionably a step backwards; for however effective it may prove as a sacred drama, it is a tacit acknowledgment either of the weakness of the music or of those before whom it is submitted for judgment.

MUSICAL matters have been selected for comment and illustration in certain of the pictorial monthly publications. The last two monthly numbers of Scribner's Magazine have contained some interesting articles by Mr. William F. Apthorp on the subject of "Mendelssohn's Letters to Moscheles," selected from a remarkable collection of manuscripts in the possession of Felix, the son of Ignace Moscheles, the composer, pianist, and most valued friend of Mendelssohn. Many of these letters disclose Mendelssohn's private views of certain musicians, his contemporaries, and if they are less flattering than might have been expected from one who was nothing if not polite and courteous in a general way, it may be assumed that they are none the less sincere. The letters, which exhibit other characteristic qualities of the great composer, his love of fun, his wit and humour, were doubtless never intended to be seen by others than those to whom they were addressed; they are illustrated by portraits of Mendelssohn and facsimiles of many of his pencil and pen-and-ink drawings, together with other portraits and views. In the Century Magazine for March is an article on "Some Pupils of Liszt," which will be read with interest because of the references to the master rather than for its literary style or value as an important contribution to artistic knowledge. There are some very fine and life-like portraits of Liszt and of some of his pupils—Eugene d'Albert, Arthur Friedheim, Alexander Siloti, Alfred Reisenhauer, and Adèle aus der Ohe. None of these portraits, it is hoped, do justice to the originals, for in neither of them is there any trace of that intelligence which might be looked for in those which have been selected as typical and favoured pupils of the great Abbé Liszt.

IN connection with the plea in defence of musical quotations advanced by Mr. Corder, in the note prefixed to the text of his "Melodrama," performed at the Crystal Palace on the 10th ult., it may not be amiss to quote a few sentences bearing on the subject from a novel recently published by Messrs. Macmillan, entitled the "New Judgment of Paris," by Philip Lafargue: "Some think," continued Trevor, in his fantastic vein, "that all the good tunes have been written, just as all the good things have been said. So possibly the music of the future will be, like much of our literature, a music of allusion. And just as a single page of a modern essay may carry us athwart the poets, from Homer to Browning, and Isaiah to Swinburne, so perhaps the symphonic exercise of the next century will here call up the ghost of Palestrina, there the shade of Berlioz, with mementoes of Offenbach and Sullivan thrown in as graces." (Vol. I., p. 46). This is not a bad reductio ad absurdum of Mr. Corder's contention. The great difficulty is that composers have no device for making it clear during the representation of their works, as men of letters have during the reading of theirs, that such and such a passage is a quotation and not an original thought.

THE educational world has sustained a loss in the death of Edward Thring, late head master of Uppingham Grammar School, to which office he was appointed in September, 1853. Under his rule music and art formed prominent features in his scholars' education. He employed six professors to instruct the boys in the playing of various instruments, and all such of the scholars as were able sang in the school choir. Quartets were given once a month during the winter terms, and at the School Concerts the talent of the school was supported by the assistance of such artists as Joachim and Ludwig. He believed thoroughly in the refining and elevating character of music as an element of education, though he was not a musician himself, and the power of distinguishing one melody from another was scarcely even rudimentary in him.

THE ROYAL ALBERT HALL CHORAL SOCIETY.

MUSICIANS will remember the extraordinary sensation caused by Verdi's "Manzoni" Requiem, when produced under the composer's direction in 1875. This was before the London public had become familiar with the most daring and ambitious works of Berlioz, and the intensely dramatic nature of the music and the novel and picturesque orchestration fascinated listeners, aided as the effect was by a quartet of soloists unapproachable for excellence. But the excitement was too great to last; critics of the old school shook their heads at the Requiem and refused to regard it save through the spectacles of English prejudice, and it would seem that the bulk of oratorio lovers found it too highly seasoned for their palates, for after a few performances to lessening audiences it disappeared from the Albert Hall Society's repertory from 1881 until the present year. Nor did the revival on the 8th ult. excite much interest, the audience being considerably below the average in point of numbers. And yet, if we make allowance for the too theatrical tone of certain portions of Verdi's Mass, enough of beauty and exquisite poetic feeling remain to compel impartial musicians to regard the work with admiration and to respect it as the utterance of an original if not very profound musical thinker. The simple pathos of the "Agnus Dei," for example, appeals more to the heart than many an elaborate contrapuntal movement, and we do not think the "Manzoni" Requiem will be consigned to oblivion in this country, though it may not be heard, for a time at least, at frequent intervals. Of the performance now under consideration it may be said that, so far as regards the choir, it was well-nigh perfect. The "Sanctus" is one of the weakest numbers in the work, but it was sung with such precision and power as to rouse a somewhat apathetic audience from its lethargy, and Mr. Barnby unadvisedly granted an encore. Mr. Lloyd alone among the soloists gave perfect satisfaction. Miss Anna Williams should not be subjected to criticism, as she undertook the soprano part at very short notice, and Madame Belle Cole and Mr. Bridson sang carefully; but it is impossible to deny that music of this class needs Italian declamation and fervour for the due realisation of the composer's ideas.

NOVELLO'S ORATORIO CONCERTS.

DR. MACKENZIE'S Oratorio the "Rose of Sharon" was, on the 13th ult., again placed before the London public, under the composer's direction. Again, also, a large gathering of amateurs heard it, and, once more, the prevailing sentiments appeared to be pleasure and admiration. It is scarcely rash to assert that those feelings were experienced in a measure greater than on previous occasions when the work has been given—a result due not to any material difference of rendering, but rather to increased familiarity with and clearer perception of an Oratorio which, in some of its aspects, is uncommon and, therefore, to musical Englishmen doubtful. Though there are many classic precedents for the elaborate dramatic structure of the book, they are found far back beyond the point where modern oratorio begins. The secular element in the story, even with its parabolic application recognised, probably strikes many conservative amateurs as open to question, while in the musical treatment of the libretto precedent is so far neglected that the average frequenter of Oratorio Concerts may be forgiven for taking up an attitude of hesitation. The remedy for all this is one resorted to by horsemen when the animal beneath them shies at a strange object. As the rider makes his steed look quietly at the cause of alarm and see that no ground for fear exists, so a proper appreciation of the "Rose of Sharon" must be brought about by placing the work before the public till the novelty in it has worn away. That done, we anticipate great and lasting popularity for an Oratorio crowded with musical beauties, and in various respects adapted to serve as a guide to those who would place the sacred musical epic in harmony with the taste of the day. It is yet too early for an expression of opinion as to the place which the "Rose of Sharon" will definitely take among its kind, but all considerations indicate one of high importance and commanding influence. Already progress to that end has begun. The fashion set in Dr. Mackenzie's work is that followed in Mr. Cowen's "Ruth," and we are strongly disposed to think that few oratorios will, for a long time to come, be constructed on any other lines. Upon the inherent qualities of the work it would be easy to write at length. We might discuss, for example, the exceeding interest and charm of the story, into the scope of which come vine-dressers and princes, vineyards and palaces, the trooping of labourers to work and stately processions to the Temple; the lilies of the field and "Solomon in all his glory." In like manner, much could be said about the music-compelling Biblical poetry; and far more regarding the mingled delicacy and strength with which Dr. Mackenzie has treated his subject, while never degenerating into the conventional and commonplace. Especially might it be noted that the composer has adjusted with great skill the somewhat conflicting claims of vocal music and the "symphonic orchestra," giving each its due share, and working both in happy harmony to the best possible end. An Oratorio thus distinguished by sterling qualities is bound to make its way, and to do so the more rapidly as public taste moves towards the advanced standpoint which the composer occupies.

The performance referred to above was quite satisfactory. Band and chorus discharged their task well, appearing to conspicuous advantage throughout the long-extended procession music, the heavy exactions of which were handsomely met. Perhaps the greatest success of the orchestra was made in the intermezzo, entitled "Spring Morning on Lebanon," all the delicate beauty of which appeared "without spot, or wrinkle, or any such thing." Miss Nordica appeared to be nervous at the outset and scarcely did herself justice. When the natural feeling abated, she sang the music of the Sulamite with equal charm and skill—unaffected expression being conjoined with technical excellence. Miss Hope Glenn, Mr. Lloyd, and Mr. Santley answered respectively for the Attendant, the Beloved, and Solomon, the two gentlemen proving that the parts they created at Norwich four years ago are theirs still by right of consummate art. Mr. Lloyd was particularly happy, and his delivery of the beautiful solo "For lo! the winter is passed," cannot readily be forgotten. The audience were frequent and hearty in applause throughout the evening; Dr. Mackenzie, who conducted admirably, coming in for a large share of honour.

SACRED HARMONIC SOCIETY.

It must be admitted to the credit of this Society that in the season just ended due regard has been paid to the claims of modern art. The universally acknowledged masterpieces of oratorio have received their customary attention, of course, but by their side have been placed some of the latest novelties in the domain of sacred music. At the first Concert Signor Bottesini's "The Garden of Olivet" was presented, and the last, which took place on the 27th ult., consisted of a far more important work, Mr. Cowen's "Ruth." This was the third performance in London of the Oratorio, including that at the Crystal Palace, so that it has now been fairly placed before amateurs. That their verdict is, on the whole, highly favourable, there is no reason to doubt; music so full of charm and variety could not fail to please, and very few can refuse to admit that the composer has treated his theme in the right spirit. It cannot be too firmly re-asserted that the story of "Ruth" is pastoral and idyllic rather than essentially religious, and if Mr. Cowen had thrown his choruses into fugal form, he might indeed have proved his mastery of science, but he would have laid himself open to the charge of pedantry. Where breadth and majesty were needed he has risen to the occasion. There are few more telling modern choruses than "The Lord said, I will send a famine," and if it be a fault that the display of counterpoint is modest, the same objection will apply to Mendelssohn's "Thanks be to God." Perfect unanimity of course reigns as to the beauty of the airs and the treatment of the quieter episodes, such as the evening scene in the harvest field, and we feel assured that music such as this will live, at any rate until it is eclipsed by something of even greater worth from the same pen.

The performance was, upon the whole, very commendable, although not by any means perfect. Three of the soloists—Miss Hope Glenn, Mr. Lloyd, and Mr. Watkin Mills—resumed their original parts, and Miss Anna Williams has rarely sung better than she did in the sympathetic music allotted to the principal character. The choruses were rendered with more vigour than refinement, but the more important numbers came out remarkably well. Mr. Cowen, who conducted, was received with warm applause by a large audience.

PHILHARMONIC SOCIETY.

THIS ancient institution opened its seventy-sixth campaign on the 15th ult. and took the field in good form, with a capital plan of operations and a new and energetic commander-in-chief, who had won his spurs under other flags. This time it will not be said that the Philharmonic plods along in the old ways, which is the usual term of reproach for performing more or less exclusively the greatest masterpieces of art. Novelty appears to be the order of the season, and some of the most famous musicians of the Continent are under engagement to bring themselves and their works for the judgment of our amateurs.

The event of the first Concert was Mr. F. H. Cowen's début as Conductor. The new bâton wielder had a cordial reception, for it seems to be everywhere recognised that the emblem of authority could not easily have fallen into hands more worthy of it. Our own opinion, therefore, need not be expressed with the amplitude which might be necessary were the matter one of contention. Enough that we share public confidence in Mr. Cowen's fitness, and a general hope of satisfactory results. Next in importance to the assumption of office by the Philharmonic chef d'orchestre was the appearance of Madame Schumann, who played the solo part in Chopin's F minor Concerto for piano and orchestra, and also accompanied Miss Lehmann in two of Robert Schumann's songs. The venerable artist, for whose sake the Hall was densely crowded, had an enthusiastic reception, for which her magnificent playing was the most fitting acknowledgment. It seemed to us that she threw quite a new light upon Chopin's work, which, as generally rendered, produces the effect of a piece of mosaic work, wanting a large and general design. In Madame Schumann's hands the pianoforte part appeared in its true character, not wanting cohesiveness, or a dignity which the elaborate embellishments were never intended to hide. This was specially remarkable in the slow movement, no longer an aimless wander about the keys, but a clearly-defined progress resulting in a definite and beautiful result. The audience were moved to absolute enthusiasm by Madame Schumann's spendid interpretive feat, and, we should say, quite forgot to notice the poverty of Chopin's instrumentation. A Suite for small orchestra, made up by Gevaert from the dance movements in Rameau's "Castor et Pollux" also contributed to the interest of the Concert. The French composer is now well-nigh banished from opera and concert, but when such an example of his art as this comes to be played we are able to understand the commanding position he occupied while living and for some years after his death. It may be said of all the members of the "Suite" that they are quaintly charming. Some of them are much more than that, and, within their limited scope, express thoughts of power in commanding style. Yet another novelty claimed attention, and received the full measure due to Professor Stanford's very impressive and masterly Prelude to "Œdipus Rex," as performed at Cambridge in November last. The composer conducted his own music, and a capital performance made plain alike the structure and purpose of a work which will bear the closest examination. Whether regarded as an example of workmanship or for its bearing upon the drama, no other verdict is possible than that here we have music in one of its highest manifestations. This is warm praise and so intended without the smallest reserve. The more familiar features in the first Philharmonic programme were Schumann's Symphony in D minor and the Overture to "Tannhäuser."

At the second Concert, on the 22nd ult., there were more novelties—plenty of them; that is to say, out of eight works in the programme, four were marked "first time in London," or "first time in England." We will glance at them in order of performance, and, first, at a Symphony in G, by Haydn. This is one of a set of six belonging to the earliest period (1759-1766) of Haydn's career as a writer of symphonies. With its companions, it seems to have been published recently, as a thing previously unknown, and all lovers of a good old master now hope that the remaining five will soon come to a hearing. Their merits, when compared with Haydn's later works of the same kind, may not be great, but features of interest doubtless exist in all of them. The "G major," at any rate, has one remarkable movement, for which alone the entire composition deserves performance. We refer to the Adagio—an effusion of remarkable beauty and originality, in which there is an attempt to combine a cadence for the violins in two parts with the ordinary form. The other movements, while having “Haydn” writ large all over them, contain nothing specially worthy of note. Both the second novelty and the third were from the pen of M. Tschaiakowsky the Russian composer, who, being on the wander in Western Europe (thanks to a travelling pension lately bestowed upon him by the artistically enlightened government of his native land), came over to London and conducted their performance. M. Tschaiakowsky, as amateurs well know, is the author of a large number of important works, although he devoted himself to music somewhat late. For the best of these we might naturally have looked under the circumstances of his début in England; but, for some reason or other, the composer preferred to bring a Serenade in four movements for strings, and a theme with variations taken from a Suite in G major, of which it is the Finale. He caused these to be performed in Paris as well as London, from which it may be inferred that they are specially representative. Value of some kind they undoubtedly have. The Serenade comprises an interesting Allegro in sonatina form; a very pretty Waltz, an Adagio full of earnest and expressive elegiac strains, and a Finale constructed upon a rollicking and simple Russian air. All the movements are distinguished by skilful workmanship and the faculty of turning the means employed to full account. As much may be said of the Suite movement, laid out for a large orchestra, from which contrasted groups of instruments are taken for use in the variations, and employed with good effect. But while recognising the merits of M. Tschaiakowsky's selections, we venture to hope that they are not the best works in his catalogue. Amateurs would have preferred music of greater pretence, and in character adapted to allow a comparison between the Russian master and his contemporaries on the ground of the highest art. The Philharmonic audience, however, did not permit any consideration of this sort to affect the cordiality with which they received M. Tschaiakowsky, or their sympathetic attitude towards the works actually presented. Both composer and works were applauded far beyond the limit of merely courteous approbation. The fourth novelty was Svendsen's second Norwegian Rhapsody—an interesting piece, slight in texture, but sonorous and animated. Among other pieces in the programme were Mendelssohn's Violin Concerto, finely and sympathetically played by M. Ondricek, and two songs contributed in a satisfactory manner by Miss Eleanor Rees.

LONDON SYMPHONY CONCERTS.

We have now to chronicle the two final performances of Mr. Henschel's enterprise, which took place on Wednesday afternoon, February 29, and Tuesday evening, the 6th ult. On the former occasion there was an excellent audience, Beethoven's Pastoral Symphony being probably the main attraction. So far as regards orchestral works, the ultra-conservatism of the public is as marked as ever. Liszt's extraordinary “Todtentanz” for pianoforte and orchestra was repeated, probably at the request of the Princess of Wales, who arrived during the performance of Mendelssohn's Overture “Calm Sea and Prosperous Voyage,” and had the good taste not to take her seat until its conclusion. Mr. Frits Hartvigson was of course again the executant in Liszt's work. The delicious Duo-Nocturne from Berlioz's “Béatrice et Benedict” was sung with the utmost charm of style by Mrs. Henschel and Miss Marguerite Hall, and Wagner's Overture to “The Flying Dutchman” concluded the Concert.

If only out of gratitude to Mr. Henschel, musical enthusiasts should have mustered strongly at the last Concert; but apart from this the programme contained two works which should have aroused considerable interest. The fact however remains that St. James's Hall was little more than half full, and at such a condition of things those who have the greatest faith in our art progress may well be astonished. Leaving unpleasant reflections for the moment, we will pass to the consideration of the Concert, the most important feature of which was Mr. Cowen's Symphony in F (No. 5), conducted by the composer. This work was produced at Cambridge on June 9 last, and a few days later was performed at the Richter Concerts, our first impressions being fully recorded in the July number of THE MUSICAL TIMES. A further hearing not only serves to confirm what was then said concerning the lofty character of the Symphony, but reveals a number of beauties hitherto unsuspected. Unquestionably in his fifth Symphony Mr. Cowen has taken higher ground than in any of its predecessors, the Scandinavian not excepted. Unfortunately, the charming and fairylike Allegretto which does duty for a Scherzo was badly played, but with this exception the performance was fairly good, and Mr. Cowen was recalled to the platform at the close. The next item in the programme was Liszt's Symphonic Poem “Tasso, Lamento e Trionfo,” which had only been performed but once before in London—namely, at one of the Wagner Society's Concerts nearly fifteen years ago. This neglect is somewhat surprising, for, on the whole, the work is more acceptable to musicians generally than several of its companions. The “Tasso” of course belongs to Liszt's Weimar period, and was composed as a kind of Overture to Goethe's drama on the same subject, which was performed in 1849—the centenary of the German poet's birth. Byron also inspired Liszt in his work, the inner significance of which will be best understood by quoting the preface in the score: “We have called up the great shade of the hero as he appears to-day, haunting the lagunes of Venice; we have next caught a glimpse of his figure, haughty and sad, gliding among the fêtes of Ferrara, where he produced his masterpieces; lastly, we have followed him to Rome, the eternal city, which crowned him, glorifying in him the martyr and the poet.” Musically the work is based to a large extent upon a motive sung by the Venetian gondoliers to the strophes of Tasso. This wailing theme enters extensively into the construction of the first movement or “Lament,” and serves as a counterpoint to the graceful waltz-like melody illustrative of the Ferrara rejoicings. Both these motives are utilised in constructing the principal subject of the Finale or “Triumph,” so that a spirit of unity pervades the entire work greatly to its advantage. The loud applause proved that the “Tasso” had been heard with pleasure, and it should not be allowed to slumber for another fifteen years. Wagner's Siegfried's Tod, and the Walkürenritt brought the Concert to an early conclusion. We understand that the pecuniary loss has been somewhat less than that on the first season, and on the strength of this a fresh guarantee fund has been obtained, and a further series of Concerts arranged for next winter. It will consist of ten evening and two morning Concerts, and the prices of admission will in some instances be considerably reduced. On this ground the hope is expressed that Mr. Henschel will receive a larger amount of support, but we are by no means sanguine.

MONDAY AND SATURDAY POPULAR CONCERTS.

In order to complete our record of these performances it is necessary to go back as far as the Concert of Saturday, February 25. This, however, scarcely needs more than formal notice, as the programme and its executants were equally familiar. Schumann's Quartet in A minor (Op. 41, No. 1) and Brahms's in G minor (Op. 25) are now general favourites with the public, and with these was associated the Tempo di Minuetto with variations, from Spohr's Violin Duet in G minor, played by Messrs. Joachim and Straus. Miss Hamlin showed a much improved vocal method in Spohr's “Rose softly blooming” and Lieder by Mendelssohn.

To the intense delight of the subscribers and many others, Madame Schumann revoked her refusal to come to England this season, and actually re-appeared at the Concert of Monday, February 27. Need it be said that there was an enormous demand for places—people beginning to assemble early in the afternoon—or that the truly great artist was received with a perfect storm of applause? True art and the personality of artists are frequently in opposition, but in the instance of Madame Schumann we have a notable exception to the rule. She forms one of the few remaining links between the present and the last of the great classical composers, and excites not only the admiration due to a superb executant, but the veneration due to one who was the helpmeet of an acknowledged master and who knew others face to face. We might easily enlarge on the many attributes which give Madame Schumann a unique place in the esteem, we might almost say the affection, of the public, but it must suffice now to say that her powers show little or no declension, her rendering of Beethoven's Sonata "Les Adieux," &c., being, as it always was, unsurpassable for grandeur of phrasing and purity of touch and tone. The audience would not rest content without an encore, for which she gave her husband's Romance in D minor, from Op. 32. Beethoven's wonderful Quartet in C sharp minor (Op. 131), still only partially understood by the majority of amateurs, and Mozart's charming Divertimento in E flat completed the instrumental programme, and Miss Liza Lehmann was, as usual, a very acceptable vocalist.

The Concert of Saturday, the 3rd ult., was perhaps the most attractive of the whole season, and hundreds of people were disappointed in the hope of gaining admission. This statement will be easily understood when we say that Madame Schumann was announced to play her late husband's Etudes Symphoniques, and that the programme likewise contained Schubert's magnificent Quintet in C (Op. 163). Mr. Joachim being engaged at the Crystal Palace, the latter work was led by Madame Néruda, and a finer performance of one of the greatest masterpieces ever written could not be imagined. Superlatives would also have to be freely employed in order to render justice to Madame Schumann's share in the Concert, but we shall not attempt the task. The Etudes Symphoniques, or "Etudes en forme de Variations," as they were called in the revised edition, must now be numbered among Schumann's most admired utterances, and are played by every amateur capable of mastering their technical difficulties; so that the performance by the composer's widow afforded an invaluable lesson in purity of style, while the absence of all exaggeration offered a rebuke to pianists of the fire and fury school who sacrifice music to mere noise. It was an occasion to be remembered by all who were fortunate enough to be present. Amid such surroundings the vocalist of the afternoon was scarcely to be envied, but Miss Bertha Moore secured a full meed of applause for her charming delivery of songs by Sullivan and Kjerulf.

On Monday, the 5th ult., a familiar programme was presented, the concerted works being Mozart's Quintet in G minor, Haydn's Quartet in G (Op. 64, No. 4), and Schumann's Fantasiestücke for piano, violin, and violoncello, in A minor (Op. 88). The last-named movements were, according to Wasilewski, intended to form a trio, but, owing probably to their sketchy nature, Schumann gave them a more appropriate title. With Madame Schumann at the pianoforte they were heard under the most favourable conditions. The great artist selected for her solo performance three of Scarlatti's harpsichord pieces, which, of course, she rendered to perfection, though we fancy the audience would have preferred to hear her in some genuine pianoforte music. Mr. Henschel's singing of Loewe's fine song "Der Erl-König" and Schumann's "Die beiden Grenadiere" aroused two extraordinary demonstrations. The versatile artist was recalled in all eight times, but he was firm in resisting an encore.

Mdlle. Marie Soldat, the young Moravian violinist, who created so marked an impression at the Bach Choir Concert, appeared on the following Saturday, and joined her preceptor, Herr Joachim, in two movements from Spohr's Violin Duet in D minor, showing the same powerful tone and mastery over her instrument as she had done in Brahms's difficult Concerto. Madame Schumann was again the pianist, her selections being Mendelssohn's Andante and Variations in E flat (Op. 82) and two of Schumann's Sketches for pedal piano (Op. 56), which she has played on several previous occasions. It should be mentioned, as a rare occurrence, that Haydn commenced and concluded the Concert, the genial old master being represented by his Quartet in E flat (Op. 64, No. 2) and his Trio in C (No. 3). Miss Kate Flinn displayed a remarkably chaste and refined vocal style in some pretty and piquant songs by Cowen and Godard.

Another late pupil of Herr Joachim appeared on Monday, the 12th ult. We refer to Miss Emily Shinner, who took part in two movements from Spohr's Violin Duet in D major. This method of giving young performers confidence by allotting them a share in a concerted work, and so preparing them for more important duties, has much to commend it. Two of Beethoven's finest masterpieces commenced and concluded the Concert—namely, the "Rasoumowski" Quartet in E minor (Op. 59, No. 2) and the Trio in B flat (Op. 97). Miss Fanny Davies was somewhat unnecessarily modest in contenting herself with Mendelssohn's Capriccio in F sharp minor (Op. 5), a piece only requiring nimble fingers to do it justice. She was heard to greater advantage in one of Chopin's Nocturnes, which she gave as the encore not unreasonably demanded by the audience. Not much can be said in favour of Herr Niemann's rendering of Lieder by Schubert and Schumann, though the audience received him kindly. His method is faulty, and he should place himself for a while under the guidance of a competent teacher of voice production.

If anything, the attendance was even larger than usual on Saturday, the 17th ult., though crowded audiences have been the rule during the month. A glance at the programme at once explained the cause of the packed assembly. Mdlle. Janotha was announced to play the "Moonlight" Sonata, and to join Herr Joachim in the "Kreutzer" Sonata. Either of these will generally fill St. James's Hall at one of Mr. Chappell's Concerts. It may be allowed that Beethoven's works admit of considerable variety of interpretation, and Mdlle. Janotha's rendering of the C sharp minor Sonata may be legitimate. At the same time, we prefer a broader reading and a more moderate use of the soft pedal in the opening Adagio. For an encore the Polish pianist gave Chopin's Marche Funèbre, probably as a suitable pièce d'occasion. Mendelssohn's Quintet in A (Op. 18) opened the programme and Mr. Santley was the vocalist.

Madame Néruda again resumed her position as leader on Monday, the 19th ult., and the Concert commenced with a remarkably fine performance of Beethoven's Quartet in F minor (Op. 95). The interest of the Concert, however, centred in the rendering, for the first time, of Brahms's Trio in C minor (Op. 101), with Madame Schumann at the pianoforte. This, the latest published work by the most eminent of living German composers, was first performed in London at a Concert given by Herr Kwast, on April 30, last year. It is singularly concise and clear for Brahms, the four movements occupying scarcely twenty minutes; but the composer has, so to speak, written his name on every page of the score, the themes and their treatment betraying his individuality in the strongest manner. If we may judge by Madame Schumann's share in the performance, she regards the Trio with admiration. She played with more physical power than on any previous occasion this season, and in great measure the very warm reception accorded to the work was due to her efforts. Her solos were Schumann's Humoresque, of which she gave only the first part, and the favourite Nocturne in F (No. 1). The Swedish vocalist, Mdlle. Janson, sang some of the airs of her native country and Schubert's "Der Tod und das Mädchen" with charming expression, and at once secured the favour of the audience.

The last Saturday performance, on the 24th ult., included no feature of sensational character, though, by the overflowing attendance and the corresponding enthusiasm, the public showed right well how reluctant it was to bid farewell to the great artists who had afforded so much pleasure during the dreary winter months. Schumann's Quartet in A (Op. 41, No. 3) and Beethoven's Trio in E flat (Op. 70, No. 2) were the only concerted works. Madame Schumann sent her hearers into ecstasies with two of Mendelssohn's "Lieder ohne Worte," and gave a third by way of encore. Mr. Joachim was also encored after playing three of Brahms's Hungarian Dances, with Miss Fanny Davies at the pianoforte; and Miss Gambogi gave proofs of her rapid improvement as a vocalist in songs by Lotti and Gounod.

On Monday, the 26th ult., the curtain fell on one of the most brilliant seasons of these world-wide entertainments. On this occasion the selection provided was really more attractive than the occasion warranted, almost every item being in itself sufficient to draw a full house. Thousands would certainly have come to hear Madame Schumann play her late husband's "Carnaval." For the first time within our knowledge she gave the entire work, with the exception of the "Sphinxes," which the composer himself has noted are not to be played. Four times was the great artist recalled after her superb performance, but she very wisely declined to play any more. The performance of Bach's Concerto for two violins, in D minor, by Madame Néruda and Mr. Joachim, with pianoforte accompaniment by Miss Fanny Davies, aroused almost equal enthusiasm. Brahms's Sextet in B flat (Op. 18), three more of the same composer's Hungarian Dances, and songs by Miss Liza Lehmann completed the programme. The thirtieth season has not been specially remarkable for the introduction of new works or new artists of eminence, but it has proved in the most conclusive fashion that the Popular Concerts are as well grounded as ever in the regard and esteem of musicians.

THE BACH CHOIR.

On the 1st ult. this Choir gave a very attractive Concert in St. James's Hall—one in which variety reigned supreme, represented by a selection of works having the least possible in common. The opening composition afforded its audience a study of the antique, carrying them, for that purpose, back to the days before Handel arrived in England, and in which it seemed that English composers, with Henry Purcell at their head, would succeed in establishing a native school of music. Purcell's "Dido and Æneas" is historically too well known for a discussion here of the circumstances under which it was written. Everybody has read the story of its composition, in 1675 or 1680, for performance by the young ladies of a genteel boarding-school. Purcell was then a very young man, and probably worked with none the less ardour because his interpreters were to be engaging young persons of the opposite sex. But it is a pity that he did not associate himself with a better co-labourer than Nahum Tate, whose libretto, though on the ground of decency it would pass muster with Mrs. Hannah More herself, is poor stuff, ill adapted to inspire a composer with noble musical thoughts. Perhaps we ought to blame Tate rather than Purcell when the opera becomes dull, as sometimes it does, but the musician deserves sole praise when, words notwithstanding, his strains rise to the level of their composer's undoubted greatness, as in Dido's death song and the concluding chorus. The opera, of course, can never possess more than an antiquarian interest, but even for that alone it deserves an occasional hearing. We should consider, moreover, that it brings before us the finest musical genius whom England ever produced—one whom it would be a lasting shame to forget. "Dido and Æneas" was performed with great care and success under the direction of Professor Stanford, with Misses Anna Williams, Thudichum, F. Clark, and Anna Russell; Messrs. Thorndike, Bernard Lane, and Kilby as representatives of the characters. The audience, we are glad to say, gave the work a very attentive hearing, and seemed thoroughly to appreciate the opportunity of making closer acquaintance with it.

Professor Stanford's "Elegiac Ode," composed for the Norwich Festival of 1884, stood next in interest to Purcell's opera, and again impressed amateurs by the beauty and fitness of the music set to Walt Whitman's splendid invocation of Death the strong deliverer, the good angel that brings peace and rest to weary mortals. A solo and chorus, written by Beethoven for the opening of the Josephstadt Theatre in Vienna (1822), and recently published for the first time, was also given. While pretty enough, the piece has no claim to rank beside the fine Overture in C, composed for the same occasion. The programme was completed by Brahms's Violin Concerto, introduced for performance by Miss Marie Soldat, a clever young artist, who has been a pupil of Herr Joachim. Miss Soldat played the work in brilliant fashion. Her method and style are those of her master, who must have found it an easy task to direct the studies of a young lady so highly gifted with musical feeling and intelligence.

CRYSTAL PALACE.

THE programme of February 25 offered as its chief attractions Schumann's Symphony in C, Beethoven's Concerto in G (No. 4), Sterndale Bennett's "Parisina" Overture, and Saint-Saëns's Symphonic Poem "Le rouet d'Omphale." The performance of the Symphony was admirable and gave rise to a criticism in one of our contemporaries recalling the method and manner of a bygone generation. Bludyer is evidently still alive. "The emotion of the Symphony," we are told, "is that of a screeching passion without lucid intervals." We presume this to be a delicate reference to the tragic end of Schumann's life. In speaking of Miss Fanny Davies's share in the Concerto, the same writer drops the 'Ercles vein for that of the sucking dove: "Her touch was delicately tender in the magic and warbling entrance of the piano after the first long orchestral tutti." Further on her liquid notes allied themselves marvellously well with the rich, low, guttural quaver of sound which seems to thrill through the second part of the sensuously beautiful movement." "Guttural quaver" is good; indeed, such an effort as the foregoing well nigh paralyses the descriptive powers of anyone who endeavours to notice the same Concert. Miss Davies's solos were two pieces of widely diverse character—a Rhapsodie in G minor, by Brahms, resolute and virile in tone, and a Staccato Etude, by Rubinstein, a very fidgetty piece to play, but demanding no outlay of intelligence on the part of the executant. Madame Patey, who was the vocalist, gave the famous aria from "Serse," "Ombre mai fu," and the recitative and air "The Lord is risen," from "The Light of the World."

In the unavoidable absence of Herr Hausmann from the Concert of the 3rd ult., Bach's Concerto for two violins and strings was substituted for Brahms's new double Concerto, Miss Geraldine Morgan, an American pupil of Dr. Joachim's, being associated with her master in the interpretation of this ever welcome work. This young lady has a good broad tone, and her intelligence augurs well for one who is still in statu pupillari. Of Dr. Joachim's share in the work, or rather in the Concert, for he played three times in all, it is enough to say that he was at his very best. For dramatic intensity, depth of feeling, fervour, and incisiveness, his rendering of Brahms's Concerto will long remain in the minds of those who heard it. The programme opened with Mendelssohn's "Lovely Melusina" Overture—an epithet easily transferable to the composition—included a splendid performance of Beethoven's No. 2 Symphony, and wound up with "Les Préludes," one of the most interesting of all Liszt's Symphonic poems. Altogether this was a red letter day for the Sydenham audience. Miss Liza Lehmann sang the arietta from "Der Freischütz," "Kommt ein schlanken Bursch," and an air from Saint-Saëns's 19th Psalm. If Miss Lehmann would but supplement her refinement and finish by a little warmth and fervour, she would turn appreciative interest into delight.

We cannot help expressing our surprise at the extraordinarily miscellaneous character of the programme on the 10th ult. The Concert opened with Brinley Richards' "God bless the Prince of Wales," the solo being sung by Mdle. Louise Dotti. After this tribute to patriotism and native talent, the Crystal Palace orchestra performed the Overture to "Euryanthe." Next followed the London Vocal Union, who contributed T. Cooke's glee "Strike the lyre." Of this body, as represented on this occasion, we are obliged to say that the spirit and emphasis of their singing was greatly in advance of the quality of their voices. Then succeeded Mdle. Dotti, who gave a very creditable rendering of Mozart's "Dove sono." Of Mr. Corder's Ballad "The Minstrel's Curse," for declamation with orchestral accompaniment, the next item in the programme, we cannot speak in very enthusiastic terms. The most attractive theme in this "Melodrama" is that which he borrows, with due acknowledgment, from Wagner. Mr. Corder was fortunate in having the text declaimed by so excellent a reader as Mr. Charles Fry, who was at once intelligent and singularly distinct. After another part-song from the London Vocal Union, and a very commendable rendering of "Angels ever bright and fair," by Mdle. Dotti, the Concert wound up with Mendelssohn's "Edipus" music. Here again Mr. Fry did excellent work as a reader, besides substituting in the intermediate text an abridged version of Franklin's translation, in place of Bartholomew's second-hand representation of "Sophocles." The orchestra was all that could be desired, but the chorus showed a tendency to flatten throughout, while the tenors were quite overpowered by their deeper-voiced brethren.

Goldmark's "Ländliche Hochzeit," though deficient in those forms which one associates with works on a symphonic scale, is well worth an occasional performance. That given by Mr. Manns at the Concert on the 17th ult. was thoroughly enjoyable, the cheerfulness and sentiment—bordering occasionally on sentimentality—which pervade the work being alike admirably rendered. Mendelssohn's G minor Pianoforte Concerto is of all the important compositions of that master the one most in danger of becoming hackneyed, and might safely be allowed a rest at the Crystal Palace. With Miss Kleeberg's rendering, however, little or no fault could be found, whether on the score of feeling, incisiveness, or brilliant execution. The Concert was also noticeable for fine performances of Schumann's "Manfred" Overture and Dr. Mackenzie's orchestral Ballade "La Belle Dame sans Merci," a work of high aim and sustained interest, which grows upon the hearer with every successive performance and only serves to stimulate the pleasurable expectations of his promised Symphony. Mrs. Hutchinson, the vocalist on this occasion, rendered good service by introducing some charming songs by the Viennese composer Fischhof. She was also heard to advantage in the recitative and aria from Gounod's "Reine de Saba," "Plus grand dans son obscurité," showing a familiarity with the purest accent of both languages as rare as it is enviable.

The programme of the eighteenth Concert of the series opened with a fine rendering of Mr. T. Wingham's Concert Overture, No. 4, in F (MS.). In this work, as the author of the analytical notice inserted in the programme has rightly remarked, there is a welcome freedom from "the terrible, the horrible, and the demoniacal elements" so frequently to be found in modern scores. The composer has taken for his motto the well known quatrain which ends with the words "Youth on the prow, and Pleasure at the helm," and in this spirit has conceived and carried out a "tone-picture" full of charming episodes. The introduction and the conclusion, with its "dying fall," are both admirable, and the second subject is tender and graceful. The great blot on this work, in our opinion, is the restless and unromantic character of the first subject, in which the "note of distinction" is entirely wanting. The Symphony, on this occasion relegated to the end of the programme, was Beethoven's in B flat, No. 4, while the central position was occupied by Wagner's "Trauermarsch." Madame Norman-Néruda played Viotti's Concerto in A minor (No. 22), a very favourable specimen of virtuoso music, in her very best style, taking the high notes at the end of the Adagio with wonderful certainty. Later on she exhibited her command of cantilena in a Larghetto by Nardini and her agility in Paganini's "Perpetuo mobile." Miss Anna Russell, a late scholar of the Royal College of Music, sang with much refinement and sympathy the Cavatina "Although a cloud," from "Der Freischütz," and songs by Mendelssohn—"Greeting" and "A Maiden's thought."

OTTO HEGNER.

THE boy Otto Hegner, who gave a Pianoforte Recital at the Princes' Hall on the 22nd ult., created a sensation by his extraordinary talent. It was acknowledged on all sides, notwithstanding the effect produced by young Josef Hofmann by his performances, that nothing equal to the real artistic ability possessed by Otto Hegner had been shown within memory by any one so young. He surpasses Hofmann in mechanical mastery of the keyboard, and is superior to him in individuality and independence. His phrasing is at once neat, accurate, and refined. He interprets the pieces he performs—Beethoven, Mozart, Bach, Mendelssohn, Raff, Liszt, Weber, and the like—like a musician of great experience. With older pianists facility is attained through a long course of study and practice. This boy possesses the quality by intuition. He brings out the various points in the several pieces with an intelligence and perception of the inner meaning as great as though he had written them. The interest excited by the playing of young Hofmann was tempered by the ever present knowledge that it was the work of a mechanically gifted child. Otto Hegner commands the admiration of experts by abilities which are on an equality with their own painfully accumulated powers. He is only eleven years of age, a bright looking boy, who plays his music from memory as though he loved every sound produced. He is certainly possessed of the most wonderful ability. His musical gifts disclosed themselves to his astonished parents in their humble German home before he had reached his fifth year. His father and Franz Fricker directed his earliest studies, and after a year and a half entrusted the further development of his powers to Herr Hans Huber, of Bale, Herr Alfred Glaus teaching him theory. The boy has played in Switzerland and in Germany before he came to England. His astonishing powers will certainly arouse as much admiration in this country as they have done abroad.

MR. CHARLES WADE'S CHAMBER CONCERTS.

THE second Concert of the series took place at Princes' Hall on February 28, a feature of the programme being the special prominence given to works in which the clarinet has a share. An effective Trio for clarinet, violoncello, and pianoforte, by Walckiers (Op. 96), was performed by Señor Manuel Gomez, M. Gillet, and Signor Carlo Ducci, and the same executants were heard in Beethoven's Clarinet Trio in B flat (Op. 11), a work occasionally given at the Popular Concerts. More attractive, perhaps, than either of these, as a means of display for the wind instrument, was Weber's Duo Concertante for clarinet and pianoforte (Op. 48), in which Señor Gomez exhibited a beauty of tone and technical mastery worthy of the highest admiration. A couple of violoncello solos, well played by M. Gillet, completed the instrumental selection. Miss Bertha Moore and Mr. Charles Wade were the vocalists, the latter singing, among other things, two cleverly-written songs by the Rev. A. Wellesley Batson. Mr. Sidney Hann accompanied.

A much more familiar scheme was presented at the third Concert, on the 6th ult. On this occasion the four talented young English ladies comprising the Shinner String Quartet appeared at each end of the programme, making their artistic qualities agreeably manifest in Mendelssohn's E minor Quartet (Op. 44, No. 2) and Haydn's Quartet in D major (Op. 64, No. 5). Besides leading these works with noteworthy intelligence, Miss Emily Shinner played Joachim's Romance in B flat, doing credit alike to her master's composition and the traditions acquired under his invaluable guidance. Loud applause rewarded her excellent performance. The first appearance this season of Herr Schönberger formed an interesting feature of the Concert under notice. Herr Schönberger played Mendelssohn's Prelude and Fugue in E minor with a crisp, even touch, a clearness of phrasing, and a cool decision of manner precisely in harmony with the nature of his theme, thereby affording his hearers unqualified pleasure. Later on in an Impromptu of Schubert's he used the tempo rubato to excess and indulging in startling contrasts of piano and forte; while immediately afterwards, in the same composer's Variations in B major, Herr Schönberger gratified connoisseurs by a performance as remarkable for intellectual thought as for purity and charm of execution. In the vocal department at this Concert, Mr. Wade was assisted by Miss Mary Morgan and Mr. William Shakespeare. The accompanist was Mr. C. Hopkins Ould.

There was a better attendance at both the above Concerts than at the fourth, which took place on the 20th ult. The Cologne Conservatoire String Quartet re-appeared and opened the programme with Beethoven's "Rasoumowski" Quartet in E minor (No. 2). It was not, on the whole, a satisfactory performance, lacking as it did refinement and polish, notably on the part of the leading violinist, who was inclined to sacrifice correct intonation to impetuous vigour and purity of phrasing to rhythmical swing. The best played movement of the four was the Scherzo. Herr Schönberger was again the pianist and proved to be in his best form, giving a thoroughly artistic rendering of the characteristic "Chant sans Paroles," by Tchaikowsky, and a less familiar set of Variations by the same composer. He was warmly recalled, and as an encore played a Mazurka of Chopin's. Later on Herr Schönberger joined the Cologne players in Schumann's Pianoforte Quintet; Herr Holländer and his companions being meanwhile heard in the Andante with Variations from Schubert's Quartet in D minor. Among the vocal items of the evening Miss Marguerite Hall's expressive delivery of Schubert's "Gretchen am Spinnrade" merits special mention. Mr. Wade sang a couple of Lieder by Dvorák. Mr. Sidney Hann acquitted himself with distinction at the piano.

MUSICAL ASSOCIATION.

MR. EBENEZER PROUT, B.A., read a paper on the 5th ult. on "Some suggested modifications of Day's Theory of Harmony." He said that in the course of his experience as a teacher he had several times met with difficulties in connection with this system, and had given considerable thought to the way in which these difficulties could best be overcome. Until about seven or eight years ago he was unacquainted with the books of both Day and Macfarren, but upon reading through the latter with one of his pupils, the completeness, reasonableness, and consistency of the system so revealed itself to him that he had arrived at the conclusion that here, and here alone, was a theory sufficiently complete to explain the progressions alike of the old and of the modern composers. But he did not ignore the objections that might be made to Day's system, as he left it. After recapitulating the salient points of the theory and pointing out certain inconsistencies, the lecturer said that no system of harmony could work in actual practice in which absolute purity of intonation was insisted upon. He contended that having to deal with the tempered scale, in which no interval except the octave was strictly in tune, the ear adjusted the faulty intonation—i.e., accepted the false as the practical equivalent of the true notes. As all our music is founded upon the tempered scale he would take that scale as the basis of harmonic investigations. Mr. Prout then enumerated the notes generated by the three roots—the tonic, dominant, and supertonic—showing how in this way the twelve semitones of the key were accounted for, and said that no other roots than these three can be taken in any one key without giving more than the twelve notes. From these roots we obtained all the chords, whether diatonic or chromatic, of the key. The tonic minor chord, Mr. Prout considered, was an artificial product obtained by arbitrarily lowering the third, for the minor third could not be found in the harmonic series of any root; but all the other chords could be explained as portions of the fundamental harmonics. Day rather dogmatically forbade the use of the chord upon the mediant, as well as the tonic chord after that upon the supertonic; but there were many instances of the employment of these progressions in the works of the great masters and he declined to be bound by any such rule. Again, no chord of the eleventh was allowed on any other root than the dominant; but there was certainly no reason why the eleventh should not be used upon the tonic and supertonic roots. Second inversions, also, might be found upon other bases than the tonic, supertonic, and dominant, although he admitted the instances were rare. In conclusion, Mr. Prout said that he had pointed out the modifications which experience had taught him were advisable to adopt, and, whatever objections might be urged against Day's method, he could only say that in practice it worked admirably.

Dr. Bridge, the chairman, said that the Day theory had been of the utmost value to him, giving him a clearer insight into the compositions of the masters, and especially aiding him as a teacher. He agreed in the main with Mr. Prout's paper.

Mr. C. E. Stephens attacked the theory generally, urging that it was essential that any system to be acceptable should not involve the use of any notes which were of faulty intonation; on this point the theory of Day was most inconsistent. Moreover, the subdominant harmony was utterly ignored, although in his opinion it was fully as important and as essential to the tonality as that derived from the tonic or dominant.

THE CLAVI-HARP RECITAL.

A LARGE number of musicians and amateurs were invited by Mr. W. H. Cummings to Princes' Hall, on the afternoon of the 13th ult., to a Recital given for the purpose of displaying the qualities of the clavi-harp. In our last issue we gave a full description of this newly-perfected invention, and there now only remains to say a few additional words concerning its effect when heard in combination with other instruments and as an accompaniment to the voice. That effect, as judged by the performances of Mdlle. Eugénie Dratz, who has made the clavi-harp a special study, bears an undeniably close resemblance to the results produced by an accomplished harpist, plus a great deal in the matter of mécanisme that is impossible to the latter on his own instrument. Whether an ordinary clavi-harpist, not possessing the remarkably delicate touch and exceptional capacity for the even execution of arpeggios shown by Mdlle. Dratz, would be able to ensure an equally close resemblance is a question we cannot pretend to decide. We are led to ask it, however, for the reason that Mdlle. Dratz herself cannot satisfactorily supply certain characteristics (more especially the true effect of the "harmonics") which belong exclusively to the harp. At the same time, the balance of advantages may fairly be said to be equal, while for all orchestral purposes we do not hesitate to assert that the clavi-harp would be an adequate substitute for the instrument it imitates. When played upon behind a screen at the above-mentioned Recital, the most careful listener failed to detect a difference between the sounds produced and those of an ordinary harp. The general effect when M. Dietz's invention was brought into view was to all intents and purposes the same. In the Largo in G, by Handel, in Benedict's Romance in D (Op. 105), and in Gounod's Meditation on a Bach Prelude—all arranged for violin, harmonium, and harp, and rendered by Mdlle. Dratz, Mr. Bernhard Carrodus, and Mr. T. Mountain—there would have been no difficulty whatever in imagining that Mr. John Thomas was executing his share in the performance instead of listening with the utmost interest among the occupants of the stalls. In the accompaniments to the vocal pieces the illusion, if it may be so termed, was just as complete. Several solo and concerted morceaux were sung by Miss Esmée Woodford, Madame Clara Suter, Miss Alice Suter, and Mr. W. H. Cummings, with a measure of effect that certainly owed much to the artistic interpretation of the obbligati by Mdlle. Dratz.

THE GUILDHALL SCHOOL OF MUSIC.

THE fortnightly Concerts given by the students of this Institution in the large hall of the City of London School do not, as a rule, call for public notice, but there are exceptions, and one such occurred on the 14th ult., when a new Cantata for female voices, entitled "The Minstrel Prince," by J. L. Roeckel, was performed for the first time. The libretto, by Mrs. Alexander Roberts, is based on an agreeable little story, and the music is delightfully fresh and piquant, the book offering plenty of opportunities for varied effects. Besides the pianoforte, there are accompaniments for harmonium, guitar, castanets, triangle, and bell. The ladies' choir, under the direction of Mr. Weist Hill, rendered full justice to the choruses, and among the soloists Miss Nellie Levey and Miss Laura Brown deserve honourable mention.

A novel but exceedingly useful feature in the work of the Guildhall School has been recently introduced. This consists of a series of weekly Recitals and Lectures by some of the most eminent professors, among them being Herr Ernst Pauer, Mr. Carrodus, Mr. H. Gadsby, Mr. W. G. Cusins, Mr. E. Silas, and Mr. G. Libotton. As example is better than precept, the students should derive much benefit from these performances.

AMATEUR ORCHESTRAL SOCIETIES.

TWO of the most important of these Associations gave Concerts just too late for notice in our last number. The programme of the "Strolling Players," on February 25, was rendered interesting by the performance of a Symphony in

Nos. 41 to 45, and 60 to 100, from "The Organist's Quarterly Journal."

F, by Gouvy, whose works are very little known in this country, though they are esteemed in France, the land of the composer's birth. By thus performing works by neglected composers of merit, amateur orchestral societies can render service to music and avoid unfavourable comparisons with professional orchestras. If we remember rightly, Gouvy's Symphony was introduced at one of M. Lamoureux's Concerts in 1881. It is a bright, genial work, not very original, nor very profound, but extremely pleasing. The rendering by the "Strollers" was exceedingly creditable. The rest of the programme does not call for remark. In the absence of the regular Conductor, Mr. Norfolk Megone, the Concert was ably directed by Mr. Pollitzer.

A very interesting programme was offered by the Westminster Orchestral Society at its ninth Concert, on February 29. It included the first movement of a new Symphony in C, by Mr. Charles S. Macpherson, of which we can speak in encouraging terms. It is marked by a high degree of musicianship, and is laid out on a somewhat elaborate scale, the writing being here and there a little too involved for perfect comprehension at a first hearing. We would recommend Mr. Macpherson in future efforts to aim at lucidity of utterance; nothing is gained by vagueness of outline or incoherence. Dr. J. F. Bridge's clever Overture "La Morte d'Arthur," first performed recently at the London Symphony Concerts, and a Pianoforte Concerto in D minor, very Mendelssohnian in character, by Mr. J. F. Barnett, were included in the programme. All these works were conducted by their respective composers, and the last-named had Miss Emma Barnett for its executant. The playing of the orchestra showed a considerable advance over previous efforts, and we are glad to note that the Society is in a flourishing condition.

BOROUGH OF HACKNEY CHORAL ASSOCIATION.

THIS Society gave an excellent performance of Schumann's beautiful though neglected work "Paradise and the Peri," at the Shoreditch Town Hall, on Monday, the 19th ult. It is a striking, and at the same time distressing, illustration of the tendency of musical societies to run in well-defined grooves that not a single performance of this finest of Schumann's choral works has been given in London since its last revival by the enterprising Hackney Association in 1883. We cordially agree with the criticism of Sir George Grove that the "Paradise and the Peri" is one of the most enchanting musical poems in existence. Perhaps the solo parts are more effective than the choral, but there is not a dull number in the work. The audience on the present occasion was somewhat smaller than usual, owing, it may be hoped, to the terribly inclement weather, rather than to any want of interest in the performance. Of the soloists it may be said that Mrs. Hutchinson, Miss Hope Glenn, and Mr. Bridson rendered justice to their established reputations, while Miss Gertrude Aylward sang the mezzo-soprano music agreeably, and Mr. James Gawthrop displayed a pleasant and well trained voice in the tenor part. Mr. Prout's admirable choir and the orchestra fulfilled their duties in a manner calculated to give general satisfaction.

WALTER BACHE.

IT is with feelings of sincere sorrow that we enter upon the task of recording the death of Walter Bache, which occurred on the 26th ult., at his house, 17, Eastbourne Terrace, Hyde Park. He was in good health until within a few days of his decease, when he caught a chill, but this was thought to be of so little importance that few of his relatives and intimate friends knew that he was indisposed at all. His illness suddenly took an alarming character, and terminated fatally. His death will be counted as a great loss to the musical profession, inasmuch as a valuable teacher is thereby taken away, while those who knew him intimately will miss a trustworthy friend. Walter Bache, the son of the Rev. Samuel Bache, was born on June 19, 1842, in Birmingham, where his father was pastor to a Unitarian congregation. Although in his earliest years he gave indication of musical tendencies, the genius of his elder brother, Francis Edward, absorbed the greater part of the attention of his parents and friends. Edward—as he was called—played in public as a child at the Birmingham Festival of 1846, when Mendelssohn's "Elijah" was produced under the bâton of the composer. Later his songs and other compositions gave promise of musical excellence, which was never fully attained. Edward died in 1858, in his twenty-fifth year. After his brother's death, Walter went to Leipzig, and for three years studied under Hauptmann, Richter, Plaidy, and Moscheles; his fellow-pupils being J. F. Barnett, Franklin Taylor, Carl Rosa, and Arthur Sullivan among others. When he quitted Leipzig, he travelled in Italy, visiting Milan, Florence, and Rome. In the last-named place he met Liszt and became his pupil and friend, and subsequently the greatest champion in England of his works. In the production of these compositions in England Walter Bache spent a fortune. This he considered only an inadequate return for the advantages he had derived from Liszt's tuition. He was wont to say that if Liszt, who never took fees from his pupils, had charged him only at the rate demanded by a village teacher for instruction, he should still be deeply in his debt. His consistent advocacy of Liszt's music was not only the discharge of an admitted obligation, but it arose without doubt from a conscientious conviction of the importance of the compositions. Even those who did not agree with him in his estimate of the works whose claims he advanced could not fail to admire his earnestness and steady persistence. Those who knew him intimately respected his straightforward character, and his undeviating pursuit of the line he followed. As the fervent upholder of the music of Liszt, he was known to the whole musical world. The loyalty of his convictions was further exemplified in his private life. His lovable character endeared and bound him to his many friends, who now with the public have to mourn a loss which cannot be replaced.

SOME further progress has been made this month in shaping the local musical event of the year, and the report presented to the General Committee of the Birmingham Musical Festival on the 15th ult. is sufficiently detailed to afford a fairly accurate idea of the merits and shortcomings of the programme. The Festival will be held, as usual, on four successive days of the closing week of August, opening on the Tuesday morning with the customary performance of "Elijah." On the same evening the first part of the Concert will be devoted to the "Stabat Mater" of Dvorák, whilst the second part will be of a miscellaneous character, comprising Haydn's Symphony in D (No. 6 of the Salomon set), together with Liszt's third Rhapsodie and Weber's Overture to "Oberon." On Wednesday morning Dr. Hubert Parry's new sacred Cantata "Judith and Holofernes" will be produced, and "The Golden Legend" of Sir Arthur Sullivan will complete the morning programme. On the same evening a new short choral work, by Mr. Goring Thomas, will be followed by Mozart's "Jupiter" Symphony, Schumann's Overture to "Manfred," and a selection from Wagner's "Meistersinger." On Thursday morning "The Messiah" will occupy its time-honoured place, and in the evening Dr. Bridge's new legendary Cantata "Callirhœ" will be followed by Beethoven's Fifth Symphony and Spohr's Overture to "Jessonda." On Friday morning, Bach's Magnificat will divide attention with Berlioz's "Messe des Morts," and in the evening Handel's "Saul" will be given here for the first time in a complete form. Among the artists will be Madame Albani, Miss Anna Williams, Madame Patey, Madame Trebelli, Mr. Edward Lloyd, Mr. Santley, and Signor Foli. The Festival managers report themselves well satisfied with the new works, so far as they have gone, that of Dr. Parry being very dramatic in treatment, and they speak highly of the quality of the chorus. The proportion of absolute novelty in the programme, it will be observed, is less than usual, but this is certainly not the fault of the Committee, who have spared no effort or expense to secure new works by composers of distinction. They are of opinion, however, that some old works of classic excellence, which have not yet been heard here, will prove very acceptable, and they expect great things in particular from the Berlioz "Requiem"—with its sensational effects and four auxiliary bands in different parts of the hall.

At Mr. Stockley's third Orchestral Concert the chief features of interest were the re-appearance here, after a lengthened interval, of Miss Fanny Davies, the Birmingham pianist par excellence, and the production of a new Orchestral Suite by a young local musician, Mr. Elgar, of Worcester. Miss Davies's selection comprised Mendelssohn's D minor Concerto, Schumann's Novelette in F (No. 1, Op. 21), and Rubinstein's Staccato Study in C (Op. 23). In each and all of these pieces Miss Davies exhibited the high technical attainments which have won for her a place in the front rank of English pianists, together with rare taste, refinement, versatility, and emotional power. Her playing of the Concerto was under every aspect a masterly effort, and in the Rubinstein Study she fairly electrified the audience by her finished execution of the most exacting bravura passages. Mr. Elgar's Suite, in D minor, consists of four movements—a Mazurka, an Intermezzo, a Gavotte, and a March—all distinguished by fancy as well as tunefulness, though in some parts over laboured and wanting in cohesion and artistic development. In Beethoven's second Symphony, the "Tannhäuser" Overture, and Mendelssohn's "Midsummer Night's Dream" music the band fully maintained its reputation. The fresh and expressive singing of Mdlle. Antoinette Trebelli was much appreciated in Haydn's "With verdure clad," Bellini's "Qui la voce," and Sullivan's "Orpheus with his lute"; whilst Mr. Henry Pope won considerable applause in Handel's "Honour and arms" and Gounod's fine song "She alone charmeth my sadness."

The Madrigal Concert given at the Midland Institute on the 12th ult. was somewhat inopportunistically timed, as it had to contend not only with the accidental disadvantages of an exceptionally raw and wintry evening, but with the pre-arranged counter attractions of Messrs. Harrison's last Concert, from which some bold and jubilant orchestral strains occasionally mingled with the dainty harmonies of the madrigal choir. Nevertheless, there was a fairly large and appreciative audience, and the performance was in all respects a most satisfactory one. The choir was in excellent form and sang throughout with rare refinement, delicacy, and truth of intonation, among its most successful efforts being Edwardes' "In going to my lonely bed," Vecchi's "Under a willow," Weelkes' "In pride o' May," and Pearsall's "When Allan-a-dale." Mr. Percy Taunton, who possesses an agreeable baritone voice, contributed several vocal solos, including a new and piquant song, "Phyllida," by Dr. Herbert Wareing, the pianist and accompanist, who also played an Impromptu of his own in F sharp minor and the Gavotte with Musette from Bach's third English Suite.

The last, and musically most important, of Messrs. Harrison's popular Concerts was that which took place in the Town Hall on the 12th ult., when Mr. Hallé's band contributed the chief part of the programme, assisted by Madame Norman-Néruda as violinist, Mr. Hallé as pianist, and Madame Lilian Nordica and Miss Hope Glenn as vocalists. Most of the orchestral selections, including Beethoven's Pastoral Symphony, Mozart's Overture to "Don Giovanni," Wagner's "Tannhäuser" Overture, and Spohr's "Dramatic" Concerto for violin, were already more or less familiar to the musical section of the audience. Of the remaining works, the most noteworthy were the "Lustspiel" (or Comedy) Overture of Friedrich Smetana, and two Légendes by Dvořák. Smetana's Overture is an original and fanciful work, without any pretensions to thematic importance, but full of colour and character—a charming mixture of pageant and pastoral. The Beethoven Symphony was splendidly played throughout, the various imitative effects and soli passages for the wind instruments being given with a finish and perfection only possible with a band of virtuosi. In the Spohr Concerto nothing could exceed the refinement and delicacy of the accompaniments, rendered with the precision of a single instrument. Madame Norman-Néruda in the solo part was heard to great advantage; Madame Nordica's fresh and sympathetic voice found excellent scope in the charming air of Susanna, "Deh Vieni," from "Le Nozze di Figaro"; and Miss Hope Glenn's excellent contralto voice was very effective in the old air from Handel's "Serse," better known as the Largo in G.

MUSIC IN EDINBURGH.

(FROM OUR OWN CORRESPONDENT.)

On the 4th ult. the first meeting of the Edinburgh Amateur Bach Club was held. Dr. Dickson read the prospectus of the Society, which has been formed for the study of Bach's compositions. Mr. Franklin Petersen read a paper on the importance of Bach's work, showing the far-reaching character of his treatment of harmony, anticipating many effects of the advanced modern school, and the assistance he gave in helping to free the treatment of the voice from the trammels of the Italian contrapuntal school. A young lady sang "My heart ever faithful," and two movements of an Orchestral Suite (arranged for violoncello) were performed.

In aid of St. David's Church Manse Fund, a popular Concert was given on the evening of the 6th ult. Messrs. Carl Hamilton, Della Torre, Colin McKenzie, and John Hartley contributed various instrumental pieces, and Madame de Greiner took the chief share of the vocal part of the programme.

On the evening of the 8th ult. Mr. Carrodus gave a Violin Recital in the Freemasons' Hall. Molique's "Fandango," Bach's "Chaconne," Svendsen's "Romance," Paganini's "Mosé in Egitto," and Scottish airs, arranged by himself, were his solos, performed with great success. Mr. J. Carrodus gave two violoncello solos—"Réverie," by Dunkler, and Popper's "Gavotte"; and Miss Marianne Fenna sang Schumann's "Er, der herrlichsste von allen," Sullivan's "Orpheus with his lute," and Wallace's "When the elves."

Under Mr. Townsend's direction, the fifth Chamber Concert was given on the 11th ult., at which a Trio by Brahms (Op. 101) and one by Raff were performed by Messrs. Della Torre, Colin McKenzie, and Grant McNeill. A Beethoven Sonata for violin and piano, and violoncello solos completed the programme.

Mr. d'Oyly Carte's Opera Company gave, with their usual success, a fortnight's performances at the Lyceum Theatre. "Pinafore" was performed during the first week, and was followed by "Patience," with Mr. John Hervet d'Egville as Grosvenor and Mr. George Thorne as Bunthorne.

Mr. J. Leslie's Opera Company gave a week's performance of "Dorothy."

On the 23rd ult. a Recital was given in the Queen Street Hall by Miss Eva Adams, aged 14. She was assisted by Madame Annie Grey (Scottish vocalist).

Herr Franz Rummel gave a Pianoforte Recital in the Music Hall, on the afternoon of the 24th ult. His programme included Bach's Chromatic Fantasia and Fugue, Beethoven's "Sonata Appassionata," Chopin's Sonata (Op. 35), and selections from Schubert, Mendelssohn, Brassin, and Liszt.

An evening Concert was given in the Freemasons' Hall, on the 28th ult., by Mr. H. A. Thompson (pianist), assisted by Mdlle. Nellie Carter, Messrs. Deas, Miller, and Galloway (vocalists), and Mr. Winram (violinist).

The twenty-first annual Students' Concerts of the University Musical Society took place on the 16th and 17th ult., in the presence of the Principal, Sir William Muir, and of some of the professors and students, citizens, &c. Under the direction of the President of the Society, Sir Herbert Oakeley, and of Mr. Sinclair, Chorus-master, the members sang a varied selection of choruses and part-songs by Cherubini, Callcott, Attwood, Bishop, Balfe, Mendelssohn, Verdi, Oakeley, and some national melodies. Solos were contributed by a lady amateur, who sang Handel's "Dove sei" ("Rodelinda") and in a duet Mozart's "Crudel, perche," the other solos being by Purcell, Schumann, and Gounod. An organ solo, "Gavotte and Musette" (MS), by the President, who played it, was one of the several pieces encored. After "Auld lang syne" had been enthusiastically sung, Sir Herbert Oakeley, on being called for, congratulated the Society on having attained its "majority," and contrasting the present condition of musical matters in the University as compared with the year in which the Society was formed, referred to the fact that, following the lead of Edinburgh, each of the Scottish Universities now had its Musical Society. Sir William Muir, in proposing a vote of thanks to the President, spoke in high terms of praise of the selection of music, its performance, and the good such societies effected.

MUSIC IN GLASGOW AND THE WEST OF SCOTLAND.

(FROM OUR OWN CORRESPONDENT.)

THE Temperance Choral Society, which was formed a few years ago, gave its annual Concert on February 28, in the Waterloo Rooms, performing, for the first time in Scotland, A. R. Gaul's new Cantata "Joan of Arc." The chorus numbered 100 voices, and was on the whole successful in its rendering of the melodious music of the choral numbers. The solo parts were represented by Mrs. Shepherd, and Messrs. Dunsmore and Fleming. Mr. W. H. Murray conducted. On the same date, Barnby's Sacred Cantata "Rebekah" was produced with marked success by the Musical Association of Dennistoun United Presbyterian Church, under the direction of Mr. A. W. Young.

A pleasant Concert of Chamber and Orchestral music was given by Mr. Henry Bretton, of Pollokshields, in the Hall of the United Presbyterian Church, on the 2nd ult., at which some of the best local players gave their aid.

Mr. W. H. Cole gave another of his series of Chamber Concerts in the St. Andrew's Berkeley Hall, on the 1st ult., and it is gratifying to be able to state that the venture has now reached the paying point, and that therefore these educational and enjoyable musical evenings are likely to become a permanent feature of the Glasgow season.

At the Saturday afternoon Corporation Recital of the 3rd ult. there was, in addition to other attractions, some excellent part-singing by Mr. J. Lillie's Choir, a well-trained body of about thirty voices. Several other "Select" Choirs, so styled, have been heard at these Recitals, which continue to be largely attended, and very specially so by the humbler classes, for whom they are mainly intended.

An excellent performance was given of A. R. Gaul's Sacred Cantata "Ruth," on the 9th ult., by the choir of Queen's Park Free Church, Mr. J. Cunningham conducting. The Hillhead Ladies' Choir gave their twelfth annual Concert on the 12th ult. The programme was mainly sustained by the accomplished ladies who form the association, and whose chief duty, it may be stated, is leading the music at the children's Sunday afternoon service. Abt's Cantata "Summer" was one of the principal numbers in the programme.

One of the most spirited of our church choirs is that of John Street United Presbyterian Church. A number of important works have from time to time been produced by it, and it has for some years been under the charge of Mr. George Taggart, a painstaking and skilful musician. The annual Concert of the choir took place on the 13th ult. Barnby's Cantata "Rebekah" formed the first part of the programme, receiving a careful interpretation at the hands of all concerned. In the second part were the unaccompanied hymn "O gladsome light," from Sir A. Sullivan's Cantata "The Golden Legend," and Mendelssohn's Motett "Hear my prayer," the Concert concluding with the final chorus in "The Mount of Olives."

The town of Johnstone, some ten or twelve miles from Glasgow, a place extremely musical for its size, has several musical associations. One of these, the Choir of West United Presbyterian Church, numbering fifty voices, gave a performance of Dr. Stainer's "Daughter of Jairus," with selections from Handel, Mozart, and other composers, on the 10th ult. Mr. Fleming conducted.

The Glasgow Society of Musicians, the most important musical association in Scotland, which is in an eminently flourishing condition, is making an effort to form a Musical Library of theoretical, practical, and literary works. The institution of a Benevolent Fund is also in contemplation.

The Annual Concert by the Kyrle Choir was given in the Queen's Rooms, on 22nd ult. Gounod's "Gallia" and Reinecke's "Summer-day Pictures" were the more important musical works performed, and the singing of the choir was good. Mr. C. Hall Woolnath conducted.

Haydn's Oratorio the "Creation" was performed by the Kinning Park Free Church Musical Association, in the Church, on the 22nd ult.; and on the 9th ult. Handel's "Messiah" was essayed by the choir of Pollok Street United Presbyterian Church.

The West of Scotland Choral Society, of about 200 voices, and conducted by Mr. H. A. Lambeth, sang at the Corporation Recital on the afternoon of the 24th ult. Their efforts in choral selections from Mendelssohn, Mozart, and others gave entire satisfaction.

MUSIC IN LIVERPOOL.

FOR the past month we have to record the first hearing, at the Concerts of the Philharmonic Society, of two important but very dissimilar works, thoroughly indicative of their respective composers. The first of these, "Moses in Egypt," was given on February 28, and received a creditable interpretation. The band and chorus did their work well. The principals were Miss Thudichum, Miss Marianne Fenna, and Miss Hilda Wilson; and Messrs. Edward Lloyd, Harper Kearton, Piercy, Bridson, Edward Grime, and Santley.

At the Philharmonic Society's eleventh Concert, on the 21st ult., Spohr's "Fall of Babylon" was given. The chorus singing was most successful. The principal vocalists were Miss Mary Davies, Miss Eleanor Rees, and Madame Porter; and Messrs. Lloyd, Harper Kearton, Bridson, and Pope. Mr. Lloyd's pure style was admirably adapted to the earnest declamation of the music of the part of Daniel, and Messrs. Bridson and Pope also distinguished themselves. Mr. Hallé conducted.

The eighth and last Concert of the Hallé series took place in the Philharmonic Hall, on Tuesday, the 6th ult. The main interest of the performance centred in the appearance of Mr. Joachim, who played as his chief item Brahms's Concerto in D, for the first time in Liverpool. Mr. Joachim also contributed, in the second part of the Concert, five Hungarian dances, composed by Brahms and arranged by himself. Mr. Hallé accompanied these dances on the piano, and they were received so heartily by the audience that Mr. Joachim supplemented them by a further extract from the same series.

Mr. Hallé played Schumann's Novelette in F and Arabeske in C in his usual clear unostentatious style, and met with a particularly warm reception. He also conducted the orchestral work, which included Beethoven's Festival Overture in C major, Schubert's Overture in E minor, and Haydn's Symphony in D (No. 5 of the Salomon series). The vocalist was Miss Busjaeger, who sang, among other pieces, Haydn's "On mighty pens" in the original German.

Gounod's charming little Opera, "Philémon et Baucis," well known on the Continent, has just been produced here in aid of sundry charitable organisations. Madame Louis, as Baucis, gave an excellent rendering of her music, and the other characters of Jupiter, Vulcan, and Philémon have been cleverly portrayed by Mr. Louis, Mr. Couris, and Mr. Ralli. The performances have been under the direction of Mr. A. E. Bartle and Mr. Courvoisier.

MUSIC IN MANCHESTER.

DURING the month ending March 24 we have enjoyed the visit of our best English Opera Company. Of Mr. Carl Rosa's enterprise, perseveringly carried on for so many years amid many difficulties and discouragements, every friend of English art would desire to speak gratefully and hopefully. More persistently than any previous manager, he has endeavoured to cultivate and foster whatever talent for the lyric drama we may boast of. Several works of high pretension have been commissioned by him; some of them have, unquestionably, been successful, and if others have fallen short in some point or other, the failure has resulted more from lack of experience as to stage requirements than from a dearth of talent. As it is announced that Mr. Goring Thomas has been authorised to write a third work, it is evident that "Esmeralda" and "Nadeshda," at any rate, justified the confidence reposed in their author. Indeed, it is difficult—apart from the absence from England of Mr. Barton McGuckin—to understand why the latter very tuneful and exciting work has not been given here as one of the prominent attractions of our too brief season. I believe that, properly advertised, it would have drawn together audiences rivalling those lured by Meyerbeer's spectacular "Robert," with its pantomimic attractions and laboured effects. "Robert le Diable" was, I believe, the eleventh effort of one who carefully matured his style so as to derive all possible aid from every available theatrical sensation. Of Meyerbeer's earlier works little is now heard, and even the one in question has practically been effaced by the larger "Grand" operas which marked the completion and perfecting of his system. When will an English composer enjoy such opportunities of educating himself, and find a manager ready to overlook his early shortcomings, and to afford him a fourth, a third, or even a second chance?

The season has, financially, been exceedingly successful. The dancing Nuns have exercised greater fascination upon crowded audiences than they were able to upon their intended victim, so strangely styled "le Diable," although he finally escaped from the paternal temptations. Mozart's "Don Giovanni" and "The Marriage of Figaro" have proved scarcely less attractive, "Masaniello" and "Carmen" have appealed not in vain, while "The Bohemian Girl," "Nordisa," and "Galatea" have served to give variety. The last-named compound has been compiled from three of Victor Massé's little operas, and perhaps that fact accounts for a want of variety, a sameness—not to say a wearying monotony—which results from a compound in which his rather insipid prettinesses are too often repeated. Balfe's "The Puritan's Daughter" was reserved as a novelty for the last week, and was given twice. Although it contains some pleasing music—especially in its more lively strains—the plot is so weak, the spoken dialogue so wearisome, and the concerted movements so entirely devoid of dramatic character that no lasting popularity may be looked for.

It is a hopeful omen that Mr. Rosa's company is shortly to have a London home, and it is with the best wishes for its success that I strongly urge the advisability—nay, the necessity—of at once taking steps to secure a powerful reinforcement. More singers must be found, whether they can act or not, and now that we have several large royally and municipally endowed schools there ought to be no insuperable obstacle to the training of qualified performers.

Mr. Hallé's closing Concert, on the 8th ult., was rendered specially interesting by Dr. Joachim's conducting of Beethoven's Triple Concerto—played by Madame Néruda, Signor Piatti, and Mr. Hallé—by a charming performance of Mozart's Overture "Zauberflöte," and by Miss Liza Lehmann's rendering of some songs, notably the old French "La charmante Marguerite." One of the many vocalists who assisted at Mr. de Jong's benefit Concert, on the 3rd ult., also merited warm commendation. In Donizetti's popular air, "O mio Fernando," Miss Eleanor Rees displayed a rich voice and a thorough appreciation of the requirements of the song and of the necessities of the large Free Trade Hall. Miss Dews and Mr. Seymour Jackson also were warmly welcomed by the very enthusiastic audience.

Dr. Watson's Vocal Society gave a fourth, and concluding, Concert on the 14th ult., the programme being of a character rather lighter than usual. Since Dr. Watson undertook the management the Society has progressed very considerably. In choral works there is a greater richness of tone, a more musically style, and a fairer appreciation of delicacies of expression. The excellence of the performances of the Society decidedly lies in concerted effort.

MUSIC IN OXFORD.

(FROM OUR OWN CORRESPONDENT.)

SINCE the beginning of the New Year, Oxford has displayed an energy in matters musical that has quite made up for the inaction of the autumn. The Oxford Gleemen, the title now borne by what used to be called the City Male Voice Union, commenced the year with a Concert on January 5, in Balliol College Hall, at which C. H. Lloyd's "Longbeards' Saga" was the principal item of the programme.

On January 10 the Cowley St. John Vocal Society gave a portion of Crotch's "Palestine" and Handel's "Acis and Galatea," with considerable success.

February was simply crowded with musical performances. First of all, on February 4, the Oxford Orchestral Association gave a Concert in Balliol College Hall, at which Mendelssohn's "Scotch" Symphony was the chief attraction. Next, a new sensation was provided for a University town by the appearance of Miss Emily Shinner and the "Quartet" of young ladies called by her name at the University Musical Union Invitation Concert, in Keble College Hall, on February 27. Schumann's Quartet in F and Beethoven's Serenade Trio were the chief works performed. A week later the great violinist, Joachim, visited Oxford, when as already noted in your columns, the University conferred on him the degree of Doctor of Music, honoris causa. The occasion of his visit was an engagement to play at a Concert in the Sheldonian Theatre, organised by the Musical Club, and this Concert was one of the most delightful that we ever remember. Unfortunately so terrible a snow-storm raged in Oxford on that day that traffic was almost wholly suspended, and the audience was consequently much more select than numerous. As far as Chamber Music is concerned, we had only one other Concert this month, a Pianoforte Recital by M. de Pachmann, in the Town Hall, on the 22nd.

Turning to the department of choral music, we find that Gernsheim's "Salamis" and Pergolesi's "Stabat Mater" were performed, under Mr. Farmer's direction, in Balliol College Hall, and that Oratorio Concerts were given in the Sheldonian Theatre by both the great choral societies. The Philharmonic Society gave "Judas Maccabæus" on the 10th, with but little success, though Messrs. Iver McKay and Watkin Mills sang capably. On the 29th the Choral Society performed "Jonah," by its Conductor, Dr. Roberts, and "The Golden Legend," by Sir Arthur Sullivan. The former work, though the composer seemed to have been hampered by the requirements of an exercise for the doctor's degree, for which, we believe, it was originally composed, was warmly received; and "The Golden Legend" made as much impression in Oxford as it has done elsewhere. The performance was superb in every respect, and attracted one of the largest audiences ever seen in Oxford. A gratifying instance of the position that music now holds in this place was afforded by the fact that the University Athletic Sports, which had been originally fixed for the same day, were postponed, to avoid clashing with this Concert.

The activity we have described lasted down to the very end of the term, and in the last week no fewer than three performances were given. On the 6th ult., a "Te Deum," composed as an exercise for the degree of Doctor of Music, by Mr. Mark J. Monk, of Banbury, was sung in the Sheldonian Theatre, under the composer's direction.

On the following day a larger number of people than might have been expected after such a series of Concerts, assembled in the same place for the Madrigal Society's Concert. The most noteworthy features of the programme were the songs contributed by the Hon. Mrs. R. H. Lyttelton, the singing of Leslie's madrigal "My love is fair," and the introduction of an unprinted part-song, by Sir Frederick Ouseley, entitled "Place the helm on thy brow." On the evening of Friday, the 9th ult., the Cathedral was crowded by a vast congregation assembled to hear Bach's "Matthew Passion." The Cathedral choir was reinforced by the boys of New College and Exeter College, and by a number of amateur altos, tenors, and basses, who did their work well.

The Lecture of the Professor of Music this term was on "Church Music of the Restoration Period," and was delivered in the Sheldonian Theatre on the 2nd ult. The most notable of the illustrations was a "Salvator Mundi," by Dr. Blow, obtained from a MS. in Christ Church Library, which was not only eminently characteristic of its age and author but also full of striking beauties.

MUSIC IN SOUTH WALES.

(FROM OUR OWN CORRESPONDENT.)

At the Eisteddfod at Aberdare, on the 5th ult., Mr. J. North, Huddersfield, and Mr. W. T. Samuel, Swansea, acted as adjudicators. The brass band contest—the piece selected for performance being “O Father, whose Almighty power” (“Judas Maccabæus”)—was engaged in by the Aberaman, Ferndale, and Ysguborwen bands. The Ferndale band (Rhondla), led by Mr. W. K. Howe, took the prize of £5. Mr. J. Sandbrook, of Dowlais, was awarded the prize for the best singing of the bass solo, “Revenge, Timotheus cries.” A prize of £5, offered for the best rendering by parties of male voices (not less than twenty-five in each case) of “The little church,” went to the Aberaman Glee Party. The chief choral competition excited a great deal of interest. The sum of £20 was offered for the best rendering of “Yr Haf” (“The Summer”), by Gwilym Gwent, choirs not to consist of less than sixty voices. Four choirs competed—Aberdare, Mardy, Ynysowen (Merthyr Vale), and Aberaman. The money was equally divided between Mardy and Aberaman choirs. The composer is a working collier in America. There were several other competitions, chiefly between soloists. The accompanist was Mr. R. Howell. On the same day an Eisteddfod was held at Penydyryn, a few miles distant. The Hirwain Choir took the prize offered for the best rendering by choirs (not less than thirty voices) of “Trewch, trewch y tant.”

A very successful performance of Ogden's Oratorio “Josiah” was given at the Temperance Hall, Aberdare, on the evening of the 22nd ult., by members of the Calvaria Choir, conducted by Mr. Theophilus Jenkins. The chief soloists were Miss Ruth Davies, Mr. G. Jenkins (Merthyr), Mr. Sandford Jones, Mr. E. Barry, Mr. W. Hughes. The accompanists were Mr. R. Howells and Mr. J. F. Phelps. The orchestra was filled by the Aberdare Orchestral Society.

Some important Eisteddfodau have been fixed for Easter Monday—notably at Abergavenny and Neath. In local musical circles much interest is naturally felt in these matters.

At Dowlais, on the 15th ult., “Alexander's Feast” was performed by the Choral Union. The leading vocalists were Miss Mary Owen, Miss Marian Price, Mr. J. Sandbrook, and Mr. M. Humphreys. In the following week the Ebenezer Harmonic Society gave a rendering at the Temperance Hall, Merthyr, of Cowen's Cantata “The Rose Maiden.”

MUSIC IN YORKSHIRE.

At the ninth Concert of Mr. Ford's series, given on the 14th ult., at Leeds, Messrs. Joachim and Piatti once more brought together a large audience of admirers. The programme was again a most interesting one, though in strong contrast with its predecessor. Mr. Joachim's solo contribution was Spohr's Eighth Concerto, and he was assisted by Mr. Eckener, Mr. Gibson, and Mr. Piatti in the rendering of Beethoven's Quartet in F major (Op. 59). Miss Fanny Davies gave a delightful rendering of Mendelssohn's Prelude and Fugue in E minor, and joined with Mr. Piatti in a perfectly sympathetic performance of Beethoven's Sonata in A major (Op. 69). Schumann's Pianoforte Quintet in E flat concluded the Concert. Miss Davies, since her last visit, has gained enormously in her art. Her playing was a very remarkable example of technique, and with greater facility has come marked artistic insight and sympathy. Miss Bertha Moore, who was the vocalist, has also made rapid progress in style, while the purity and firmness of her voice are refreshing. Her selection of songs might, at the same time, be improved. The series was brought to a close on the 21st ult. by a “Drawing-room” Concert, to which subscribers and their friends only were admitted. The innovation proved a great success. The programme was somewhat lighter in character than usual, the only work of serious importance being a Sonata by Mozart. The executants were Mdlle. Clotilde Kleeberg and Mr. Peiniger. Mrs. Bartholomew was the vocalist, and accompaniments to her songs were played by Mr. Whewall Bowling.

While on the subject of Mr. Ford's Concerts it may be stated that next season they will be resumed as Subscription Concerts and will be under the direction of a committee of management, on the same plan as the Bradford Subscription Concerts, which have proved so great a financial success. However much one may regret that Mr. Ford himself has not been able to realise the hopes with which he set out, it is to be desired, in the interests of music, that the Concerts will not be allowed to languish or deteriorate under the new management.

Mr. Joachim was also heard at the Subscription Concert given at Bradford, on the 9th ult., by a crowded audience. His selections on this occasion were Brahms's Concerto in D and a Chaconne from one of Bach's Sonatas—an excerpt with which he has made most of his audiences familiar, but which would not have been played on this occasion but for the death of the late Kaiser, out of respect for whom Mr. Joachim omitted a number of his own dance transcriptions from the music of Brahms. Apart from the great violinist's share in it, the programme was remarkable for the musical treasures which it contained. Mozart's Symphony in D minor was a perfectly delightful number, and Mr. Hallé contributed “In Memoriam,” three exquisite examples from the rich store of gems bequeathed by Stephen Heller. The Entr'acte and Ballet music from “Rosamunde,” the Overture to Marschner's opera “The Vampire,” the stirring music to “William Tell,” and Bennett's Overture “The Wood Nymphs” were each in their turn magnificently played by the band. Madame Trebelli, who was in her best and irrefragable form, sang an excerpt from Donizetti's “Lucrezia Borgia,” the gavotte from “Mignon,” and the Habanera from “Carmen.” This was the final Concert of the series, and was in many respects the best and most brilliant of the excellent musical gatherings promoted by this enterprising committee.

Another appearance was made by Mr. Joachim in the West Riding during the month—namely, at the Huddersfield Subscription Concert, on the 14th ult.—the thirteenth of the series—on which occasion he was accompanied by Signor Piatti and Miss Fanny Davies, with Miss Bertha Moore as vocalist. At the last of these Concerts, given on the 27th ult., Bach's Passion music to St. Matthew was given.

The Leeds Philharmonic Society gave what was called an extra Concert of miscellaneous music at the Coliseum, on the 16th ult. The programme was evenly divided between sacred and secular music, among the items within the former category being two of the most important vocal works of the evening—namely, Mendelssohn's “Judge me, O God,” and Bach's Motett “I wrestle and pray.” The performance of the latter was scarcely up to the usual standard of the Society, but the rendering of Mendelssohn's work was all that could have been desired. Miss Anna Williams, in addition to other work, sang the solo to Mendelssohn's “Hear my prayer” with true devotional feeling, and Gounod's well-known “Ave Maria.” The works of Pinsuti, Smart, Leslie, Sullivan, and C. H. Lloyd furnished the material for the secular part of the programme. Lloyd's beautiful madrigal “The rosy dawn” was particularly effective. One of the most interesting features of the evening proved to be the violin solos of Mr. Holländer, who gave Mendelssohn's Violin Concerto, to which an accompaniment was played by Mr. Alfred Broughton, and two short pieces by Wieniawski and Sarasate. Schumann's Air with Variations in B flat, for two pianofortes (Op. 46), was well rendered by Messrs. Broughton and Alfred Benton.

On the 2nd ult. the Huddersfield Glee and Madrigal Society gave the second Concert of the season in the Victoria Hall. “The bells of St. Michael's tower,” “O hush thee, my babe,” “Who shall win my lady fair,” Alfred R. Gaul's setting of Mrs. Hemans' poem “The better land,” Bishop's glee, “The fox jumped over the parson's gate” (encored), Macfarren's part-song “The miller,” Schumann's “Gipsy life,” Cooke's “Strike the lyre,” and Hatton's part-song “The bait” were sung in excellent style. The soloists were Miss Norah Bromley, Miss Ada Burton, and Mr. J. G. Hewson. Mr. North conducted, and Mr. J. E. Sykes played the pianoforte accompaniments with remarkable ability and artistic effect.

The Huddersfield Choral Society, on the 16th ult., gave “Israel in Egypt” with great credit. The magnificent double choruses were rendered with a vigour and precision and a volume and freshness of tone which disarmed criticism. The accompaniments too were admirably rendered, and the combined forces were kept well in hand by Mr. John North, their most experienced and energetic Conductor. The principals were Miss Clara Leighton, Miss Hope Glenn, and Mr. Edward Lloyd. Mr. Fred Brown was leader, and Mr. Ibeson was at the organ.

Mr. Haddock, of Leeds, has continued his course of musical evenings throughout the season with success. Next season he proposes to strike out a more ambitious line, and if he is adequately supported intends to secure the services of such executants as Miss Zimmermann, Miss Schirmacher, Miss Marie Krause, Messrs. Pauer, Bach, and Pachmann.

Mr. Edward Misdale introduced at his third and final Concert, on the 19th ult., one of Bradford's cleverest amateurs, Mrs. Norman Salmond. With her assistance Mr. Misdale produced three compositions for two pianos—Moscheles' "Hommage à Handel," Schumann's Andante and Variations, and one of Schumann's characteristically lively pieces. The players met with vigorous approval. A well-written Sonata by Dr. Swinnerton Heap, for clarinet and piano, was performed by Mr. C. Fawcett and Mr. Misdale. Mr. Norman Salmond was the vocalist. Mr. Isidor Cohn, with the assistance of Mr. Vieuxtemps, and Miss Marie Lummert, as vocalist, gave his second Concert on the 2nd ult. Beethoven's Sonata in A, for piano and violoncello (Op. 69), was among the works presented.

At Mr. Christensen's fifth Matinée, held on the 17th ult., in the Albert Hall, Leeds, Messrs. Max Blume, Eckener, and Giessing were the executants, and a very intelligent performance was given of trios by Schumann and Rubinstein, Herr Blume giving one of Beethoven's piano Sonatas.

Mr. Sykes, of Halifax, finished his series of Concerts on the 15th ult. He was assisted by Messrs. Joachim and Piatti, and Miss Fanny Davies, with Miss Bertha Moore as vocalist.

OBITUARY.

HENRY CORRI.—Mr. Henry Corri, the well-known vocalist and actor, so long associated with English Opera, especially during the Pyne and Harrison period, died on Tuesday, February 28, and was interred at the Honor Oak Cemetery. Mr. Corri was a distinguished member of a family connected with music and the drama in this country for the past 200 years. His grandfather, Domenico Corri, was one of the founders of the Philharmonic Society, and his father, Haydn Corri, was a colleague of Braham. Mr. Corri's répertoire was as varied as it was extensive. During his career he played nearly 100 operas, and created many of the characters in operas by Balfe, Macfarren, Mellon, and others. He was a member of the Covent Garden Fund.

CIRO PINSUTI.—This well-known musician and composer died suddenly at his residence in Florence, on the 11th ult., consequent upon an attack of cerebral apoplexy, said to have occurred when he was seated at his piano-forte. The incidents of Pinsuti's career are not sensational, but in most respects honourable to his industry and talent. As a youthful "prodigy" in Rome, he attracted the attention of Mr. Henry Drummond, a once famous member of Parliament, who brought him to London, and kept him for some years in his own house. Pinsuti studied during that period under Cipriani Potter (composition) and Blagrove (violin), subsequently returning to Italy, entering the Conservatorio at Bologna, and becoming a private pupil of Rossini. In 1848 Pinsuti returned to England, to establish himself as a teacher. He became, however, better known as a composer, not so much through his two operas, produced in Bologna and Milan respectively, or his "Te Deum," written for a patriotic occasion, as through his songs and concerted vocal music. The songs rose to the number of about 250, and with some forty-five part-songs, carried their author's name through the whole English-speaking world. Their popularity has been, and still is, enormous; not without good reason, to be found in a happy combination of musicianly qualities with features adapted to please the public taste. During the later years of his residence amongst us Pinsuti was a professor at the Royal Academy of Music, and so much in request for private lessons that he might have extended his labours indefinitely. However, in 1885 he considered his life's work accomplished, and retired to his native city, Sinalunga, where he was born, in 1829. Pinsuti was a Knight of the Crown of Italy.

THOMAS GERMAN REED.—The death of Mr. Thomas German Reed, on the 21st ult., at his residence, St. Croix, Upper East Sheen, Surrey, in his 71st year, is announced. He was the founder of the drawing-room dramatic entertainments so long given at the Gallery of Illustration, Regent Street, and subsequently at St. George's Hall, Langham Place. In these he was assisted by his wife, an actress of high distinction—Miss Priscilla Horton. They went about the country with pieces designed to parody the different styles of singing in Europe. These were the germs of the entertainments at the Gallery of Illustration, which for some time were supported by the talents, not only of Mr. and Mrs. German Reed, but of Mr. John Parry, Miss Fanny Holland, Mr. Arthur Cecil, and others. Mr. Corney Grain first attracted notice as the successor of John Parry. Mr. Reed was an excellent pianist, a good actor, and a clever mimic.

THE Great Triennial Handel Festival, to be held at the Crystal Palace in June next, promises to be as interesting as any of its predecessors. The principal vocalists engaged are Madame Albani, Madame Nordica, Miss Annie Marriott, Madame Valleria, Madame Patey, and Madame Trebelli; Mr. Edward Lloyd, Mr. Barton McGuckin, Mr. Santley, Mr. Bridson, and Mr. Brereton. The Organists are Mr. W. T. Best and Mr. Alfred J. Eyre, and there will be a chorus and orchestra of 4,000 performers. The Conductor is Mr. August Manns, who has on former occasions proved himself in every way fitted for the duties he has to perform. The Great Rehearsal is on Friday, June 22; "The Messiah" on Monday, June 25; the Selection on Wednesday, June 27; and "Israel in Egypt" on Friday, June 29, the concluding day of the Festival. Concerning the Selection day, it is stated that it will, as heretofore, afford an opportunity for performing works less widely known, and therefore possessing some novelty, and also for exhibiting the versatility of the great composer's genius. The Organ Concerto, for instance, will be No. 7, in B flat, specially interesting from the fact that it is the only composition in which Handel has included in the score a distinct part for the pedals. As on former occasions this will be played by Mr. W. T. Best. The other instrumental works introduced for the first time will be the Overture to "Samson," and also that to "Semele." The principal movement of the latter is a Fugue in C minor, and the Finale a Gavotte. The Sonata in A, for violin, the melodious charm of which delighted the large audience on the Selection day of the Bi-centenary Festival in 1885, will, by special request, be again performed by over 200 violinists. Choruses from "Belshazzar," "Alexander Balus," and the 95th Psalm will be sung for the first time, also arias from the Italian operas "Giulio Cesare" and "Deidamia." From "Ottone" an aria for baritone will be introduced, which all Handelian biographers and historians have hitherto declared to be irrevocably lost, the autograph of which, however, was recently found by Dr. A. H. Mann amongst the musical treasures of the Fitzwilliam Museum, Cambridge.

THE Hereford Musical Festival will be held on September 11, 12, 13, and 14 next. The arrangements are in progress, the desire being to make the programme as attractive as possible. The week's proceedings will commence on Monday, September 10, with the customary rehearsal in the Cathedral at 10 a.m., to be followed by the rehearsal in the Shire Hall at 7 p.m. The Festival proper opens on Tuesday, September 11, with Mendelssohn's "Elijah" in the morning; Sullivan's "Golden Legend" will be given in the evening at the Shire Hall. On Wednesday, September 12, all the performances are to take place in the Cathedral, the programme including a Selection from "Samson" (Handel), "The Woman of Samaria" (Bennett), the "Creation," first and second parts (Haydn), "God, Thou art great" (Spohr), and "The Song of Miriam" (Schubert). On Thursday, September 13, will be given the Mass in D minor (Cherubini), Ode "Blest pair of Sirens" (Dr. Parry), "St. Polycarp" (Ouseley)—and a Miscellaneous Concert. On the last day, Friday, September 14, "The Messiah" of Handel (11.30 a.m.) will be given, and a Chamber Concert, always usual here since its institution by the late George Townshend Smith, will conclude the Festival. The following artists are engaged—viz., Madame Albani, Miss Anna Williams, Madame Enriquez, Miss Hilda Wilson, Mr. Edward Lloyd, Mr. Santley, and Mr. W. H. Brereton. Mr. J. T. Carrodus, leader of the band. The list of Stewards now amounts to 230, being the largest number of acceptances of any Hereford Festival. The Hon. and Ven. Archdeacon Stanhope and Rev. G. E. Ashley will act as joint Hon. Secs., and Dr. Langdon Colbourne will again officiate as Conductor. Sir A. Sullivan will personally conduct his "Golden Legend" if his health permits.

THE National Opera Company in America has entered upon a new phase of existence. A means has been arrived at by which it may be enabled to continue its existence for the benefit of the artists who have so generously served it. It is to be carried on by the artists themselves upon the co-operative principle, this being the unanimous desire of all concerned. It has been asserted that the cause of the want of success was found in the director of the Company, Mr. Locke, who had given the American people credit for a desire to patronise higher forms of musical art than those which they were proved to be willing to support. The American Musician, in allusion to the subject, says: "The failure of Mr. Locke is no cause, however, for discouragement as to the future success of National Opera. The American people are not to blame, and can distinguish for themselves whether an operatic enterprise is deserving of patronage or not. It is, of course, a disgrace to the two great branches of the English-speaking race, the people of England and the United States, that the wealth and fashion of London and New York support Italian and German opera in preference to opera given in their own language. But it is not from the wealth and fashion that any change may be expected. It is from the common people, the 'plain' people, as Abraham Lincoln called them, that the support will come which will ultimately establish a national opera in this country, as it has been established in France, Germany, and Italy."

A CROWDED and fashionable gathering was attracted to Princes' Hall, on the 24th ult., by the Concert given by the South Kensington Ladies' Choir in aid of the funds of the South London Fine Art Gallery and Free Library. The selection of pieces showed praiseworthy eclecticism, notably those sung by the choir under the able and spirited direction of Mrs. Arthur O'Leary. This lady was responsible for the training of a numerous well-balanced body of fresh voices, and an admirable result was made manifest in the steadiness and careful regard for nuances that characterised their singing. Among the items meriting special mention were the soprano solo and chorus, "Though all thy friends prove faithless," from Spohr's "Calvary" (solo by Miss Hubert); the tenor solo and chorus, "The wave sweeps my breast," from Gade's "Crusaders" (solo, Mr. Henry Piercy); and Schumann's chorus, "Gipsy Life," arranged for the choir by Mr. Arthur O'Leary, the solos sung by Miss Hilda Erskine and Lady Nicholson. Three of Brahms's Trios for female voices were also capitally sung to the horn obbligati of Messrs. Standen and Mann. Miss Alice Gomes, Madame Mudie Bolingbroke, and Mr. Piercy contributed some vocal pieces, and Miss Lucy Riley (replacing Miss Emily Shinner) earned for her violin solos some of the loudest applause of the evening. Miss Raven, Miss O'Leary, and Mr. Ernest Fowles were in the piano.

A MOST interesting series of Organ Recitals, entitled "Six Hours with the Organ Compositions of J. S. Bach," given by Mr. A. E. Bishop, at St. Mary Abchurch, E.C., on the six Monday afternoons in Lent, was brought to a close on Monday last, the 26th ult. The Recitals, which have throughout been of a very high order of excellence—including the whole of the Six Organ Trio-Sonatas, the Passacaglia, many of the best-known Preludes and Fugues, and many also of the less-known (or almost unknown) Chorales with variations and short pieces—have been fairly well attended by most attentive listeners, despite the inclemency of the weather and the deterrent influence of an insufficiently warmed church, but for which drawbacks the audiences would probably have been much increased. It was, however, both satisfactory and encouraging to note that scarcely any persons left the church before the close of any of the Recitals, although many entered during their progress. Mr. Bishop proved himself a most artistic and classical player, and deserves the cordial thanks of those who wish well to the highest forms of art, scarcely less for the instructive and interesting annotations of his programme-books than for his endeavour to bring to notice the too much neglected and half-forgotten works of the greatest of musical composers.

THE annual Concert of the violin classes, under the direction of Mr. W. Fitzhenry, took place at the Birkbeck Institution on Friday evening, the 23rd ult. The students, both of the junior and senior advanced classes, played with their usual precision, reflecting credit on the training of their teacher, Mr. Fitzhenry. The selections consisted of Andante Maestoso for violins in four parts, violoncello, and piano (H. Tolhurst), Scottish National Airs (S. Jarvis), and Canzonetta (Paradies). The vocalists were Miss Ethel Winn who sang "When the heart is young" (Buck) and "Be wise in time" ("Dorothy"); Mr. Arthur Thompson, who gave "In a distant land" (Taubert) and "Once I loved a maiden fair"; and Mr. W. G. Forington, who sang "The devout lover" (M. V. White) and "I wonder why" (L. King) in his usual finished style. Mr. T. E. Gatehouse met with his accustomed success in his violin solos by Chopin, Sarasate, Papini, and the Andante and Finale from Mendelssohn's Concerto in E minor. Mr. J. Kift gave two humorous songs with admirable effect. Mr. Charles Fry was announced to recite, but was unavoidably prevented from appearing, his place being taken by his pupil, Miss Edith Pusey, who gave two recitations with much ability.

THE spring Concert of the London Sunday School Choir took place on the 24th ult., in the Albert Hall. The programme was to a large extent a repetition of that performed at the fifteenth annual Sunday School Festival at the Crystal Palace in June last. The number of voices, however, was reduced from 5,000 to 1,500. The first part of the Concert consisted of sacred, the second of secular music, and the choir was successful in both. Mendelssohn's choral "Sleepers, wake," David Davies's "Magnificat," Henry Leslie's "The Pilgrims," F. Abt's "The Woods," and Schumann's "Gipsy Life" were sung. The London Sunday Schools' orchestral band took part in the Concert, and Mr. John Saunders, their leader, obtained an encore for a violin solo. Mr. Luther Hinton acted as Conductor, Mr. David Davies as Organist, and Mr. C. H. Churchill as pianist. Madame Antoinette Sterling sang three songs, "The Reaper and the Flowers," "The Three Fishers," and "A Dear Wife," the two last being encored.

AN Irish Exhibition is to be opened early in the coming summer at Olympia, Kensington. Ireland possesses great natural resources and important industries, and a comprehensive display of what she can produce or manufacture will not only be an object lesson of the greatest interest to the people of Great Britain, but will do much to assist the revival of trade in Ireland. The Exhibition is begun under the happiest auspices. It knows neither politics, religion, nor class, but has for its Executive Council and Patrons the most distinguished representative men—nearly 700—representing every phase of political, religious, and social life. The Exhibition, which will include displays of art treasures and musical performances, will be opened on June 4 and remain open until the end of October, and the whole of the vast space at Olympia will be utilised. Among the special features will be a representation of an Irish village, with the veritable peasants at work upon their cottage industries—the dying of yarn, making lace, knitting, &c.

AT the People's Palace, in the Mile End Road, Concerts are given every Saturday night at very cheap prices, which are attended by large numbers of people. On Saturday, the 3rd ult., some 2,500 persons heard with the greatest attention an excellent performance of Mendelssohn's Oratorio "St. Paul," accompanied by the organ and pianoforte, played by Mr. G. Boddington Smith and Miss Alice Edmunds respectively. The soloists were Miss Alice Gomes, Mrs. Julia Lennox, Mr. Bernard Lane, and Mr. Musgrove Tufnail. The Conductor was Mr. Willem Coenen, and the choruses were sung by the Hampstead Choral Society, a small but excellent body of singers, who gave a remarkably good reading of their share of the work, all the value that can be imparted by due attention to good tone and expression being attained by careful study and artistic direction. The audience thoroughly enjoyed the performance, and expressed their approval by discriminating applause.

THE summer season of the Richter Concerts, under the direction of Mr. N. Vert, and with Dr. Hans Richter as Conductor, will commence on the 7th of May. The whole series will consist of nine evening Concerts, which will take place at St. James's Hall on the following Mondays—May 7, 14, 28, June 4, 11, 18, 25, July 2 and 9. The orchestra of 100 performers will have Mr. Ernst Schiever as leader, and the Richter Choir will be directed by Mr. Theodor Frantzen. In addition to works by Wagner, J. S. Bach, Beethoven, Berlioz, Brahms, Haydn, Liszt, Mozart, Mendelssohn, Saint-Saëns, and Schumann, the claims of modern English composers will not be disregarded. Dr. Stanford's Symphony (the "Irish"), which met with so warm a reception on its production at the Richter and Oratorio Concerts last year, will be repeated; and Dr. Mackenzie's Overture to "Twelfth Night," which was written this winter in Florence, will be performed for the first time.

ON Sunday evening, the 4th ult., the choir of St. John's, Waterloo Road, S.E., gave a performance of Mendelssohn's 42nd Psalm, "As the hart pants." Sir Julius Benedict's "St. Peter" was given on Tuesday evening, the 20th ult., with Master Warren, Miss Jennie Bawtree, Mr. J. Gostic, and Mr. Frederick Winton as soloists, and Mr. Edmund West at the pianoforte. The choir (surpliced) numbered fifty voices. The choruses were rendered with noteworthy smoothness and accuracy, and the soloists were all well up to their work. Mr. J. B. Dart, to whose efforts the success of the performance was mainly due, directed the performance and supplied the organ accompaniment. On the 28th ult., "The Messiah" was sung, by the Kyrie Society and St. John's Choirs combined, under the direction of Mr. F. A. W. Docker, and with Mr. E. H. Turpin at the organ. It is intended to repeat the performance of "St. Peter" some time during the present month.

MR. WILLIAM NICHOLL'S second Chamber Concert, at the Steinway Hall, on the 20th ult., was deprived of its principal feature of interest—the first performance of three German songs by Dr. A. C. Mackenzie—the late arrival of the copies from Leipzig rendering a postponement unavoidable. As it stood, the most important item in the programme was the great love duet from the first act of Wagner's "Die Walküre," which was rendered with artistic care and feeling by Miss Pauline Cramer and Mr. Nicholl. The accompaniments were most ably interpreted on the pianoforte by Mr. Armbruster, and, despite the loss of effect owing to the absence of an orchestra, the audience evidently appreciated the excerpt, recalling the performers twice. The rest of the Concert must be passed over, though it may be said that the selection generally was marked by artistic taste.

FOR the annual congress of the National Music Teachers' Association of the United States, which will be held in July at Chicago, Theodore Thomas's orchestra of sixty performers has been engaged, and a chorus of 400 voices secured. As the representative English work on this occasion, Dr. Hiles's Cantata "The Crusaders" has been selected. Last year's gathering was attended by about five hundred of the leading musicians of Canada and the States, meetings—often two or three at a time—being held each day during the week, from 9 o'clock in the morning till late in the afternoon, the evenings being devoted to the enjoyment of choral and orchestral music in a hall holding about 4,000 people.

THE London Church Choir Association will hold their annual Festival at St. Paul's Cathedral on Thursday evening, the 26th inst., at 7.30 p.m. The Association are departing this year from what we believe to have been hitherto their rule, of introducing either a new Service or Anthem at their Festival; but no one can complain of the quality of the music selected, including as it does Eaton Fanning's Service in C, Dr. Stainer's Jubilee Anthem "Lord, Thou art God" (the first three movements), and the Hallelujah Chorus from Beethoven's "Mount of Olives." The Festival will be under the direction of Dr. Martin, the honorary Conductor of the Association.

A VERY successful Concert was given on the 15th ult. at the City of London College, White Street, Moorfields, by the College choir and band, under the direction of Mr. W. G. McNaught. The first part of the programme consisted of Haydn's "Spring," in which the solo parts were ably sustained by Miss Linda Rivers, Mr. J. H. Mullerhausen, and Mr. G. E. Cowie. The second part included Haydn's Symphony in D, part-songs by the choir, and a violin solo by Miss Annie Ward, which evoked an enthusiastic encore, a similar compliment being awarded to songs by Miss Rivers and Mr. Mullerhausen. Mrs. McNaught accompanied on the pianoforte.

THE proposal to raise a Memorial to the late Sir George Macfarren, in the form of a Scholarship at the Royal Academy of Music, has already resulted in the promise of nearly £1,250. But to provide something towards maintaining the scholar in addition to paying the cost of his musical education, the fund must amount to £2,000, or even more. Subscriptions are received by the Hon. Treasurer, Mr. Alfred H. Littleton, 1, Berners Street, W.; and by the Hon. Secretaries, Mr. Charles E. Stephens, 37, Howley Place, W., and Mr. J. Percy Baker, Willersley House, Wellington Road, Old Charlton, Kent.

THE following three performances have been given by the Kyrie Choir, under the direction of Mr. F. A. W. Docker:—"Samson," on the 7th ult., in St. Luke's Church, Kilburn; soloists, Miss Mary Bliss, Miss Ellen Cooper, Mr. John Probert, Mr. James Blackney, and Mr. C. Beaumont Barr. "Elijah," on the 19th ult., in Christ Church Westminster Bridge Road; soloists, Miss Mary Bliss, Mrs. Dran, Mr. John Probert, and Mr. Jabez West. "St. Paul," on the 21st ult., in St. Stephen's Church, Poplar; soloists, Miss Ellen Tyer, Miss Ellen Cooper, Mr. George Micklewood, and Mr. James Blackney.

AT St. Anne's Church, Poole's Park, N., on Palm Sunday, there was an excellent rendering of Dr. Stainer's "Crucifixion." The soloists were in excellent voice and sang their parts effectively. The choristers, too, were fully equal to the task assigned to them. The various recitatives, choruses, and hymns (the congregation joining heartily in four of the latter), were sung with much pathos and reverence, and the demeanour of the large congregation, and the devout manner in which the service was conducted, suited well the solemn season which it was intended to commemorate.

AT St. Stephen's, South Kensington, on the Sunday afternoons in Lent, Stainer's "Crucifixion" has been sung; and, on Friday evenings, Gounod's "Mors et Vita," with orchestra, harp, and organ. After this service the orchestra played Gounod's "Marche Religieuse," Handel's Dead March in "Saul" being substituted on the late German Emperor's funeral day. The soloists, members of the choir, were Master Warwick Major and Master Frazer, Mr. Frederick Cundy, and Mr. Albert Rayment. Organist, Mr. Warren Tear; Conductor, Mr. Hamilton Robinson. Director of the Music and Organist at St. Stephen's.

ON Friday evening, the 9th ult., a meeting of the members of the Highbury Quadrant Church and Congregation, was held in the Hall attached to the Church to bid farewell to Mr. G. R. Norman, upon his departure for Ireland. During the evening an illuminated address and a purse of fifty sovereigns were presented to him in appreciation of his services to the Church as Choirmaster and Conductor of the Choral Society for the last six years. A selection of vocal and instrumental music was given by Mr. A. T. George, Organist of the Church, and some members of the choir.

MISS ANNIE E. HOLDOM gave her fourteenth annual Concert at Morley Hall, on Tuesday, the 6th ult. The vocal numbers were entrusted to Miss Evans, Miss Lottie Smallman, Miss Grace Walker, Mr. S. Foulds, Mr. Roberts, and Mr. F. E. Lacy. One of the chief features of the evening was a piano and violin duet, by Miss Annie E. Holdom and Mr. Ernest Aylmer, which won a well-deserved encore. The Concert was a great success and was attended by a large and appreciative audience. Miss Holdom accompanied throughout, and Mr. Varley Newman and Mr. Edward Simmons were the musical directors.

At the Great Assembly Hall, Mile End Road, on Saturday, the 3rd ult., Mendelssohn's "Elijah" was performed. Miss Marianne Fenna, Madame Clara West, Miss Lottie West, Madame Osborne Williams, Mr. John Probert, Mr. Sidney Barnby, Mr. Thomas Cassidy, Mr. James Blackney, and Mr. Thomas Kempton were the soloists. Mr. J. B. Zerbini was the leader of the band; trumpets, Mr. T. Harper and Mr. Poulter. Mr. Duncan Callow was at the organ, and the band and chorus of 200 performers were conducted by Mr. G. Day Winter. The hall was well filled.

A LECTURE on "Deppe's Principles of the Mechanism of Pianoforte playing," was delivered by Herr Ehrenfechter at the Steinway Hall, on Wednesday afternoon, the 14th ult. As explained by the lecturer, there does not appear to be much that is novel or peculiar in the system of Herr Deppe, who occupies a high position as a teacher in Germany, and for the most part we can endorse what was said as sound and familiar doctrine. In this, however, precept was better than example, the technique exhibited by Herr Ehrenfechter himself being far from satisfactory.

A CONCERT was given in Craven Hill Congregational Church, Craven Terrace, Lancaster Gate, W., on Thursday, the 8th ult., by the Bayswater Orchestral and Choral Societies. The programme consisted of Mendelssohn's "Lauda Sion," Schubert's Symphony (Unfinished) in B minor, and Rossini's "Stabat Mater." The vocalists were Miss Adelaide Mullen, Miss Jessie King, Mr. Charles Chilley, and Mr. Robert Hilton. Mr. Fred. W. Noakes (Organist of the Church) presided at the organ, and Mr. Harkness Lait conducted.

At Woodgrange Hall, Forest Gate, on the 20th ult., Miss Julia Allen gave a Concert in aid of the Stratford Ragged Children's Mission. She was assisted by Miss Florence Thompson, Madame Annie Williams, Miss Emily Foxcroft, Mr. W. H. Pettitt, Miss Janie Hutchinson (violin), Mr. C. Wickham (clarinet), Mr. R. Henri Goddard (elocutionist), and Mr. Robert W. Wilson (accompanist). Miss Allen's solos were Beethoven's "Moonlight" Sonata and Raff's Caprice. Altogether, Miss Allen is to be complimented on the success of her Concert.

ANOTHER performance of Mr. Alfred Cellier's Cantata "Gray's Elegy" was given by the Dorothy Company, on the 7th ult., at the Princes' Hall. The rendering on the whole was very commendable, considering that most of the performers have hitherto been chiefly engaged merely in light comic opera. In the second part Miss Marie Tempest sang the solo in Mendelssohn's "Hear my prayer" with much taste. A new Suite de Ballet, by Messrs. Leslie and Caryl, was a disappointment, the music being very commonplace.

On Sunday, the 11th ult., at the Parish Church, Kew, Dr. Stainer's Oratorio "The Crucifixion" was admirably rendered by the choir, ably assisted by Mr. A. Kenningham (of St. Paul's Cathedral), the bass solos being entrusted to Mr. Sydney Beckley. The unaccompanied chorus "God so loved the world" was beautifully sung, the pitch being strictly maintained. Great credit is due to the Choirmaster (Mr. Breadmore) and Mr. Harry E. Warner, the Organist, for their efforts in so successful a performance.

On February 29, at St. Andrew Undershaft, E.C., a special Service of Music was given before a large congregation—sacred solos and anthems by the choir of St. Andrew's, orchestral music by the "Church Orchestral Society," organ solos and accompaniments by Mr. W. J. Winter (assistant Organist at Westminster Abbey). Conductor, Mr. W. M. Wait, Organist and Choirmaster of St. Andrew Undershaft. For the first time, a selection from Mr. Wait's new Cantata "St. Andrew" (at present in manuscript) was given.

THE Members of the Grosvenor Choral Society gave their 193rd monthly Concert at the Grosvenor Hall, Buckingham Palace Road, on the 23rd ult., when a selection from Mendelssohn's "St. Paul," and Sacred Songs befitting the season were given to a large and sympathetic audience. The soloists were Miss Hannah Jones, Mrs. Frame, Miss Bond, Mr. Frame, and Mr. H. Davis. Mr. Tonking presided at the organ and Mrs. T. P. Frame at the pianoforte. Mr. David Woodhouse conducted.

WITH reference to our remarks in our last issue, we are informed that the Kentish Town Musical Society have decided to restore Dibdin's tomb in St. Martin's Burial Ground, Camden Town. We are sure our readers will be glad to learn that this work is to be undertaken by a local Musical Society. Mr. T. Eccleston Gibb is the Honorary Treasurer, and Mr. J. P. Fitzgerald, 178, Kentish Town Road (to whom all communications may be addressed), Honorary Secretary of the "Dibdin Memorial" Fund.

DR. MACKENZIE'S setting of Buchanan's Ode "The New Covenant," written for the opening of the Exhibition in Glasgow, in May next, is in the Press, and will shortly be issued to the public. The varied allusions in the poem suggest changeful treatment, otherwise the work is practically in one movement, leading up to a magnificent climax. The melody of the Old Hundredth Psalm is most effectively employed at the conclusion, so as to enlist the co-operation of the assembly, in addition to the choir, band, and organ.

A PERFORMANCE of Dr. Stainer's Cantata "The Crucifixion" was given in the Church of the Holy Innocents, Hornsey, on the 14th ult. Messrs. Lawrence Fryer and Frank May were the soloists, and the choral portions were sung by the Holy Innocents (Hornsey) Musical Society, the congregation joining heartily in the hymns. Mr. Edwin Drewett presided at the organ, and Mr. Donne Smith, the Organist of the Church, conducted.

MR. J. GLADNEY WOLFF gave his second annual Concert at the Morley Hall, Hackney, on the 5th ult. A highly interesting programme was given by the following performers:—Miss Kate Fusselle, Miss Flora Edwards, Miss Nellie Bradshaw, Miss Jennie Argent, Mr. Alfred Probert, Mr. Henry Thorn, Mr. Charles Wolff, Mr. Louis B. Mallett (solo violinist), Mr. Alfred Allen (solo pianist), and Mr. Lewis Frost, the latter officiating as accompanist.

THE Highbury Philharmonic Society gave an excellent performance of "Elijah" at their third Concert, on the 5th ult. The soloists were Miss Anna Williams, Miss Florence Monk, Miss Hilda Wilson, Miss Rose Dafforne, Mr. Charles Banks, Mr. T. R. Croger, Mr. Frank Ward, and Mr. Watkin Mills. The band and chorus, under the able direction of Mr. G. H. Betjemann, acquitted themselves in highly creditable fashion.

A FREE performance of Handel's "Messiah" was given on Wednesday evening, the 21st ult., at Chelsea Congregational Church, under the direction of Mrs. Layton, F.C.O., who officiated at the organ. There was an excellent string band and a large and efficient chorus. The solo parts were taken by the Misses Florence Hughes, Laura Carter, and Jessie King; and Messrs. Howden Tingey, W. Briggs, J. Catten, and Edward Layton.

MDLLE. JEANNE DOUSTE gave her third Pianoforte Recital at the Princes' Hall on February 29, when her charming and sympathetic touch met with cordial appreciation. By special desire, Mr. Francesco Berger's Gavotte and Musette from the Suite in G was included in the scheme—winning the only encore during the afternoon. In Rubinstein's Trio in B flat, Mdle. Jeanne Douste was ably supported by Mr. F. Arnold and Mr. W. Whitehouse.

A CONCERT was given, on the 13th ult., by the Kentish Town Musical Society, at the Stanley Hall, Upper Holloway. The vocalists were Miss Edith Stow, Miss Minnie Kirton, Mr. Arthur Thompson, Mr. Charles Chilley, Mr. Donell Balfe, and Mr. McC. Chambers. Mr. John Saunders gave solos on the violin, and Mr. Thomas Physic was the accompanist. The programme was well selected and duly appreciated.

THE Birmingham and Midland Musical Guild have just issued the fourth Annual Report of their proceedings. Papers by Mr. Charles Lunn, "On Definitions, Impressions, and Ideas"; by Mr. Stratton, "On a Telephone of Fifty Years Ago"; by Mr. Langston, "On Musical Ethics"; and other matters, show the activity and the enterprise of the Guild.

MR. WILFRED DAVIES, Organist and Director of the Choir, gave an Organ Recital, on the 15th ult., at St. Luke's Church, Hackney. Pieces by Bach, Mendelssohn, Merkel, Smart, Redhead, Wély, Handel, Capocci, and others were performed. The Organist was assisted by Miss Eleanor Gregory (harp) and Mr. A. L. Spittle, R.A.M. (violin).

A SERIES of Saturday Afternoon Concerts, at the Royal Albert Hall, commenced on the 31st ult., and will be continued throughout the season; each Concert will commence at 3.30 and last about two hours. The programmes will consist of popular music, rendered by eminent artists, choirs, choral societies, orchestral and military bands, &c.

MR. G. AUGUSTUS HOLMES gave an Organ Recital at St. George's, Camberwell, on the 18th ult., before a large and attentive congregation. The programme, consisting of compositions by Wély, Mendelssohn, Guilmant, and Schubert proved very interesting. Vocal music was given by Mr. Horace Petley and a Quartet.

A CONCERT in aid of the funds of the recently erected Parish Church, Gunnersbury, was given in the parish room on the 2nd ult., when the Choral Society, under the conductorship of Mr. C. Lawrence, and with the assistance of friends, gave a performance of several vocal and instrumental pieces.

MR. FARMER'S Oratorio "Christ and His Soldiers" was performed, under the conductorship of Mr. R. W. Lewis, at the Chiswick Vestry Hall, on the 15th ult. Other pieces were sung by Miss Edith Ruthven, Miss Helen Killik, and Mr. P. O. Coward. The Concert was in aid of the funds of Gunnersbury Church (St. James's).

A PERFORMANCE of "Samson" was given in the Presbyterian Church, Ossulston Street, Euston Road, by the Kyrle Choir, on the 1st ult. The soloists were Mrs. Edwards, Mrs. Oram, Mr. d'Arcy Ferris, Mr. Albert Orme, and Mr. J. Winspeare McCarty. Mr. William Tate accompanied and the Conductor was Mr. A. H. Orme.

THE last number of the Quarterly Musical Review contains the commencement of a series of articles on the subject of "Instrumentation," from the organ to the orchestra, written by the editor, Dr. H. Hiles, who has treated the subject in his own original and thoughtful manner.

BACH'S "St. Matthew" Passion was sung at St. Paul's Cathedral, on Tuesday evening, the 27th ult., with full orchestra and a largely augmented choir. There was a vast and devoutly attentive congregation.

THE interesting old organ in Dulwich College Chapel, originally built by England in 1760, has lately undergone restoration and enlargement by Messrs. Lewis and Co. It now contains twenty-five stops and 1,198 speaking pipes.

MR. HERMANN KLEIN'S annual, Musical Notes, is now in the press, and will be published in a few days. As a musical record of the year, this issue will be even more comprehensive than its predecessor, and a fuller index will be appended.

ON the 18th ult. Dr. Stainer's "Crucifixion" was performed at Christ Church, Clapham, before a large congregation. The solos and choruses were well rendered by the choir. Mr. George Way presided at the organ.

THE name of Mrs. Wilson-Osman should have been given in connection with the performance of "The Redemption," at Greenock, last month, instead of Mrs. Osborne Williams.

MR. W. S. HOYTE has been appointed a Professor of the Organ at the Royal College of Music.

REVIEWS.

Addresses and Lectures. By George Alexander Macfarren. [Longmans and Co.]

THE admirers and pupils of the late Principal of the Royal Academy of Music, together with others associated with him in the work of teaching, will rejoice to find in this series of collected Addresses and Lectures much that will remind them of his worth and of his intellectual powers. Ten of the chapters comprise the Addresses delivered to the students of the Royal Academy during a period of as many years. Some of these derive their chiefest interest from their personal references to the work done in the place over which he presided. Others are of general application, and will be read with keen interest by those to whom the personal allusions are dark and dumb things. His applications of classic fables, as in the case of Alcestis and Marsyas, are very happy. The sketch of the history of music in the Address of 1882, of the history of the Academy itself and its famous Principals (1886), and his last inaugural Address, September 24, 1887—the imagery once more drawn from classic fable—the Lectures on the Lyric Drama, and on Handel and Bach, are all full of suggestion. It is well known that Macfarren viewed with distrust the exponents of the advanced school in music. He shows in his Essay on the Lyrical Drama that the quality of the Leitmotif, which was so much vaunted of late as a novelty of the composer, is to be found in many previous writers, some of whom used it "not as a pantomime trick of bringing up a stage goblin, but a very high medium of expressing the musical meaning."

In the concluding words of the book having reference to Handel and Bach, he says:—"Let us never forget that these two authors (Handel and Bach) stand as a pyramid that will defy the ravages of time, and must ever be the monument of the musical powers of the eighteenth century; but if you will accept this fancy, let it be extended by the supposition that the pyramid is inverted, that its apex was in their own era, and that its constant expansion widens with the course of time, with the capability of men to perceive if not to appreciate its vastness, and that as the cultivation of musical intellect advances, so will its apparent extent. We expect in generations to come there will still be regard to what these men have done, a regard which I trust we all here entertain. In summing up the whole estimate of the characters of the two, one may apply a term, which has almost become a cant term, and say that the real 'music of the future' is that of Handel and Bach."

There are many other Addresses by the late learned Professor, which were printed in detail in certain musical journals as they were delivered, but the Editor of the present collection has displayed good judgment in bringing together only those which show the author at his best. The book is well printed, and is adorned with a photographic portrait of considerable fidelity.

Friedrich Lux, sein leben und seine Werke dargestellt. Von Dr. August Reissmann.

[Leipzig: Breitkopf und Härtel.]

It has been said that great men have no special nationality. They are cosmopolitan. If the labours of their brain have any power of reaching the soul at all, nationality is not considered. Humanity is influenced by the emotions, and when a work makes a direct appeal to those emotions, it is a matter of small consequence, if of any at all, what was the mother-tongue of him who makes it. Music in particular, of all the arts, possesses, like painting and sculpture, this power. Therefore musicians, as those who deal with this especial form of language, are citizens of the world. Their labours, if worthy, are enjoyed by all who possess the will and the desire. Dr. Reissmann shows, in his sketch of the Life of Friedrich Lux how much he has done to render his name worthy. Yet scarcely a note of his music has ever been heard in England. For this reason perhaps we may account for the fact that his name does not appear in any English dictionary professing to give some account of notable musicians. He is a man of considerable mark in his own country; and remembering that his labours during the sixty-seven years of his life comprise operas, compositions for orchestra, for military band, chamber music, organ pieces, pianoforte pieces, and many vocal works, it is quite time that he was admitted into the ranks of those musicians whose efforts are admitted into favoured places in the estimation of the public out of his own country. There are many men who spin music as a spider does threads, and who rest in their own efforts after the manner of the Arachnidæ. They live a comparatively solitary life, and their productions are only made available in dire necessity, as the cobweb is employed to staunch an accidental wound. But Friedrich Lux is not of this description; his music is well known and greatly admired; his skill as a conductor is recognised. Allowing for the enthusiasm of his biographer, and judging chiefly from the evidence afforded by his written works, they are clever and deserve their popularity. The story of his life includes a description of his works, accompanied by musical illustrations of the chief features; and the steel engraving of his portrait from a photograph shows a face of intelligence and firmness of purpose. Englishmen who can read German will be interested in the book, which is appreciatively written, and all who can admire good and well written music will be glad to hear one or other of his works "some of these days."

The Village Queen. Pastoral Cantata for treble voices. Composed by Charles Vincent, Mus. Doc., Oxon.
[Novello, Ewer and Co.]

THE opportunities for dramatic license which certain old English customs afford to the poets have not been neglected. The demand for musical pieces for female voices, for use in Schools, Colleges, &c., has prompted librettists to utilise all the known customs and probably to invent a few more, for no reference is to be found in Brand to the many quaint and poetical practices asserted to exist. So long as the words are passable the legend upon which they are supposed to be founded needs neither excuse nor authentication. It is known that Village Queens are still annually crowned, but it is doubtful whether the ceremonies are in every case attended with so much glamour of poetry as in the present case. Here the words and sentiments are very pretty and some of the images employed are sweetly fanciful. Dr. Vincent has arranged his music so as to fully satisfy the dramatic needs. There are airs, duets, choruses with instrumental festal music, all of the brightest and most attractive patterns. The whole of the music is of the most interesting character, and some of it, as for example, the opening choruses "Awake, awake," "Behold the day," the Finale "For long shall we remember," the duet "Yes! sleep no more," the songs "Let the merry fives," "O nightingale," and so forth, are far above the dead level of conventional interpretation which the character of the words would seem to inspire. Altogether the Cantata is well worthy of the notice of those who are in search of novel and pleasing things of its kind.

Sonate (D dur) für Pianoforte und Violine. Composit von B. Horwitz (Op. 1). [Berlin: R. Sulzer.]

THE development of the Sonata form out of the old Suites has been attained by a process well known to every student of the history of music. The possibility of its expansion in regions as far distant from the accepted form of the Sonata as the Sonata was from the Suite, seems to be the aim of most of the composers of the present day who choose to express their thoughts in classical form. This is certainly the case with the present Sonata in D major, for violin and piano. There are points of departure from the standard models, such as an ever shifting tonality and a tendency to break forth in the opening section into the regions of the "free fantasia." The disadvantage of this plan is less to exhaust the skill of the composer—for few among the most daring would be so unwise as to use every device at the outset and have nothing to say but commonplaces afterwards—so much as to leave little to the imagination of the hearer. However, taking Herr Horwitz's music as it stands, without reference to any design of extension which he may have had, it will be found that he writes well and effectively for both instruments. The Adagio is a beautiful piece of work, and the Finale, in Rondo form, is both brilliant and fascinating, such as would place the powers of the executants in the most favourable light before their hearers.

Psalm cxxii., "I was glad." By Edward Hodges, Mus. Doc., Cantab. [Novello, Ewer and Co.]

THIS is a re-issue of a work written in 1855 for the consecration of Trinity Chapel, New York, which will account for the character of the music being widely different from that of church compositions of the present day. A generation ago the influence of modern theories of harmony and of foreign schools of sacred music had only just begun to be felt. Dr. Hodges' Psalm, therefore, is in the manner of eighteenth century anthems, and is a very good example of its class. The writing is almost purely diatonic, contrapuntal, and florid. The organ part mainly supports the voices, which, it should be said, are treated with far more consideration than is frequently the case in later compositions. In short, those who are not entirely wedded to recent developments in service music cannot fail to be pleased with this Psalm, which would make a capital anthem for dedication festivals, the re-opening of churches, and such like occasions.

A Dream of Long Ago. Song. Poetry by M. Powis Bale.

Edith. Gavotte, for the Pianoforte.

Composed by J. T. Musgrave.

[Novello, Ewer and Co.]

THE first of these songs is a charming specimen of pure vocal writing, in that ballad form which seems fast departing. The harmonies throughout are both appropriate and refined. The rocking accompaniment in the "Cradle Song" suggestive of "Slumber music" is, of course, the common property of composers; but Mr. Musgrave has woven in with this an extremely pleasing melody, and truly sympathetic with some graceful lines from The Girls' Own Paper. The Gavotte proves to us that the composer is more spontaneous in vocal than in instrumental music. The piece is well written throughout, and would certainly please, if well performed, but it lacks any original thought.

Three Songs. Written and composed by Cotsford Dick.
[Weekes and Co.]

THE composer of these graceful little vocal pieces has already made his name as a writer of simple and melodious compositions well suited for amateur singers and performers, and the three contributions before us fully sustain his reputation. In this case he is his own poet; and although his verses are somewhat more conventional than his music, we can confidently recommend both to the notice of vocalists who are not too ambitious to include such songs in their drawing-room répertoire. Of the three, we prefer the last in the book, "A Caprice"; but a little variety in the accompaniment would certainly be desirable.

The Organ Works of John Sebastian Bach. Edited by J. F. Bridge and James Higgs. Book 7. Preludes and Fugues. [Novello, Ewer and Co.]

IN the present instalment of this magnificent edition of Bach's immortal organ works we have five preludes and fugues, the first three of which are regarded as among the composer's finest masterpieces. This remark applies especially to the great examples in A minor and B minor, well known to every lover of the organ. The others are less familiar, though almost equally worthy of study. As in every preceding part, the editors have supplied a valuable preface, the material of which is largely taken from Spitta. The suggested metronome rate and the limits for registering add to the utility of the edition.

Soft Voluntaries for the Organ. By George Calkin. Book 10. [Novello, Ewer and Co.]

AS in former books of this useful series of Voluntaries, we have here a series of six pieces of two or three pages each, admirably written for the organ, full of pleasing, though dignified, melody, and of very moderate difficulty. Those in triple measure, simple or compound, are especially charming.

FOREIGN NOTES

M. H. BARBEDETTE, the friend and biographer of the late Stephen Heller, is, Le Ménestrel informs us, just now engaged upon completing and editing a number of compositions left in a sufficiently advanced state by that genial and remarkable composer of pianoforte music. They comprise, inter alia, two suites of Ländlers, six highly characteristic Preludes, and a work consisting of an Allegro agitato, a Barcarole, and a Fileuse. One of the chief difficulties in M. Barbedette's task is the deciphering of the manuscripts on account of indistinct handwriting, Heller, formerly so neat a writer, having been almost completely deprived of his sight during the last few years of his life.

The Paris Court of Appeal has reversed the judgment of three months' imprisonment passed upon M. Carvalho, the late Director of the Opéra Comique, on account of alleged culpable negligence in connection with the burning of that theatre. M. Carvalho, whose case excited universal sympathy, has been the recipient of numerous congratulations in consequence of the above decision.

A new Symphony, by M. Vincent d'Indy, the ideas for which have been inspired by Schiller's "Wallenstein" Trilogy, was performed for the first time, and well received, at one of the recent Lamoureux Concerts of Paris. M. Vincent d'Indy has already shown his predilection for the great German poet, by the production, some two years since, of a Cantata, the libretto of which is a free version of Schiller's "Lay of the Bell."

The municipal authorities of Rouen recently distinguished themselves by prohibiting the performance of the March from "Tannhäuser," which had been included in the programme of a Concert given for charitable purposes at the above town.

M. Gounod has, it is stated in French journals, just completed some fresh ballet music to his opera "Roméo et Juliet," which is to be included with the fourth act, and will be produced at the next performance of the work at the Grand Opéra.

The meeting for the present year of the Allgemeine deutsche Musikverein is to be held from the 10th to the 13th of next month at Dessau. The programme of the performances in connection therewith, as foreshadowed in German papers, includes Berlioz's Symphony "Harold in Italy," Liszt's "Faust" Symphony, Wagner's "Kaisermarsch" and Peter Cornelius's Overture to his recently resuscitated opera "Der Barbier von Bagdad," as well as some sacred works by old masters and minor compositions by Becker, Bronsart, D'Albert, and others.

We have received the programme of a highly interesting historical Concert, recently given by the Bohnsche Gesangsverein, of Breslau, devoted exclusively to Spanish composers, and including choral numbers by the following—viz., Cristóforo Morales (about 1520), Tomás Luis de Victoria (1540-1608), Matias Veana (early part of the sixteenth century), Diego Casada (about 1660), Sebastiano Duron (about 1700), Juan García Salazar (died 1710), Diego Muelas (died about 1742), José de Torres Martínez Brabo (1665-1738), Francisco Secanilla (1775-1832), Félix Cuellar y Altarriba (1777-1833), and Hilarion Eslava (1807-1878).

The 10th ult. was the centenary of the birth of the German poet, Joseph von Eichendorff, to whose genial muse the musical world is indebted for many of the lyrics of Mendelssohn, Schumann, Robert Franz, and others.

Richard Wagner's "Rheingold," the opening part of the "Nibelungen" tetralogy is, at last, in course of serious preparation at the Berlin Opera House, where the performance of the complete cycle, realised on every other important operatic stage of the Fatherland, remains as yet a thing to be accomplished.

A Ladies' String Quartet has just been formed at Berlin, consisting of Mesdames Thomas, Elsa and Emma Menzel, and Marie Spiess. After giving some concert performances in the German capital, the artists will, it is stated, undertake a concert tour in the provinces.

A violin, the body whereof consists entirely of clay, is just now being exhibited at the Berlin Industrial Museum, the maker being Herr Ludwig Rohrman, of Muskau. The instrument is said to possess a strong and full, albeit somewhat hard tone, as has been repeatedly demonstrated in the concert-room. There are two violins made of a similar material among the permanent exhibits at the Museum of Rouen, where they are regarded as great curiosities; there was also a violin made of porcelain included in the late Exhibition of Musical Instruments at the Albert Hall.

The first performance, in the German language, of Messrs. Gilbert and Sullivan's operetta "The Mikado" took place on the 2nd ult., at the Theater an der Wien, of Vienna. The popular work was exceedingly well received, although the performances are said to be scarcely on a par with those of the English company which introduced "The Mikado" to the Austrian capital. The German version is from the pen of Herren Zell and Genée.

Herr Victor Nessler, the successful composer of "Der Trompeter von Säckingen," is engaged upon a new opera, the plot of which is founded upon a picturesque chapter in the history of Strassburg in the sixteenth century. The libretto has been furnished by an Alsatian writer, the composer himself being a native of Alsace, and the production of the new work is looked forward to with much interest by a considerable section of the German musical public.

Madame Rosa Sucher, the gifted interpreter of Wagnerian heroines, will, the Neue Berliner Musikzeitung states, after all accept an engagement at the Royal Opera of Berlin, in consequence of an understanding having been arrived at with Herr Pollini, of the Hamburg Stadt-Theater. Herr Albert Niemann, the veteran Wagner tenor, just returned from a highly successful sojourn in the United States, has again become a member of the Royal establishment in question.

Herr Franz Rummel, the eminent pianist, after completing in February last his highly appreciated series of Chamber Concerts at Berlin (to which reference has already been made in these columns), has since taken part in Concerts at Dresden, Frankfurt, Cassel, and other musical centres of Germany, being everywhere accorded a most flattering reception. Herr Louis Hartmann, the well-known critic of the Saechsische Landeszeitung, speaking of the performance by Herr Rummel of the Concerto in E flat by Beethoven, expresses himself in terms of the highest eulogium, both as regards the technique and the intellectual qualities displayed by the artist, whose interpretation he moreover characterises as "perfectly sound, free from affectation, yet full of warmth and individuality."

Mr. Frederic Lamond, the young Scottish pianist, continues to meet with high appreciation, both as performer and composer, during his present concert tour in Germany.

A new opera, "König Arpad," by the Dutch composer, M. Verhey, has just met with a most successful first performance at the German Opera of Rotterdam. The libretto, written in German by M. van Loghem, is founded upon an episode in the history of the Netherlands.

M. Leeuwrik, of Utrecht, is said to have completed an excellent Dutch translation of the book of "Lohengrin," for the purpose of the performance of the work by the Netherlands Opera Company.

The interesting musical library of the Vicomte Charles de Clerque de Wiscoq de Sousberghe, a distinguished Belgian amateur, was placed under the hammer some weeks since, at Ghent, and realised the comparatively low sum of 5,000 francs.

A new orchestral Suite from the pen of Signor Luigi Mancinelli has just been performed with conspicuous success by the Philharmonic Society of Madrid.

The following new operatic works have lately been successfully brought out at Italian theatres—viz., at Naples, "Le Nozze di Fiorina," by the Signorina Teresa Guidi (Teatro Nuovo), and "L'Isola azzurra," by the Maestro Mollica (Fenice); at Castelfranco, "Il Grembialino rosa," comic opera, by Signor Azzo Albertoni; at Lucera, "Il Saggio," comic opera, by the Maestro Alfredo Soffredini.

The French diapason normal has now also been introduced in the military bands of the Republic of Chili.

Verdi, according to Italian papers, is at present engaged upon the composition of a one-act operetta, the libretto of which has been written by a lady belonging to the Roman aristocracy. The new work by the veteran Maestro is to be first performed by a circle of distinguished amateurs of the Italian capital in aid of a charity.

Verdi's "Otello" has been produced, up to the present, on fourteen operatic stages and in five different languages—viz., in Italian at Milan, Venice, Brescia, Parma, Turin, Modena, Rome, and Naples; in German at Hamburg, Munich, and Vienna; in Hungarian at Buda-Pesth; in the Czech language at Prague; and in Russian at St. Petersburg.

The following statistics of the season of opera which has just come to a close at the Metropolitan Opera-house of New York will be read with interest. The operas produced were: "Walküre," "Siegfried," "Götterdämmerung," "Tristan und Isolde," "Lohengrin," "Tannhäuser," "Die Meistersinger" (Wagner); "Le Prophète" (Meyerbeer); "Faust" (Gounod); "Euryanthe" (Weber); "La Juive" (Halévy); "Fernando Cortez" (Spontini); "Fidelio" (Beethoven); "Der Trompeter von Säckingen" (Nessler). There were sixty-two performances in all, thirty-six of which were accorded to the above Wagnerian operas. The total receipts amounted to 184,000 dollars, whereof upwards of 115,000 dollars have been realised by Wagner's works, being an average of some 3,200 dollars for each performance, against some 2,460 dollars for each of the others. The continuance of the performances having been secured for another season, the director of the New York German Opera, Mr. C. Stanton, will in the course thereof also produce "Rheingold," thus completing the cycle of music-dramas forming the "Nibelungen" tetralogy.

A monument is to be erected at Zittau, his native town, to Heinrich Marschner, the composer of "Der Tempel und die Jüdin." The work is about to be executed by Herr J. Hartzler, the eminent Berlin sculptor, who also executed the Marschner statue in front of the Opera-house at Hanover.

On February 13, the anniversary of the death of Richard Wagner, a commemorative performance of "Lohengrin" was given at the Madrid Opera House in presence of a crowded and highly appreciative audience.

The death is announced at Paris, on the 15th ult., of M. Henri Blaze de Bury, son of that somewhat eccentric musical savant, known by the name of Castil-Blaze, in whose footsteps he followed as regards the taste for and the ability to write upon subjects connected with our art. M. Blaze de Bury was for many years the musical critic of the Revue des Deux Mondes, and was also the author of an interesting biography of Meyerbeer and of a number of able biographical sketches published under the respective titles of "Musiciens Contemporains" and "Musiciens Anciens et Modernes." The deceased author was in his seventy-fifth year.

Jean Delphin Alard, the brilliant violinist, and professor of his instrument at the Conservatoire, died suddenly at Paris, on February 22. He was also a composer of taste and merit, and was born at Bayonne in 1815.

Thomas Klein, a clarinetist of European fame, and for many years professor of that instrument (for which he has written a number of compositions) at the Viennese conservatorium, has just died at Vienna, at the age of eighty-six. He was a native of Nuremberg.

The death is also announced, at Milan, of Enrico Calzolari, a once much admired tenor singer, who appeared in operas by Bellini, Donizetti, Rossini, and Verdi, and of whom Fétis, in his "Biographie Universelle des Musiciens," speaks as having been "the last tenor of the good Italian school." Calzolari was born at Parma in 1823.

CORRESPONDENCE.

VENEZUELA.

TO THE EDITOR OF "THE MUSICAL TIMES."

SIR,—In perusing a file of the Opinion Nacional, of Caracas, Venezuela, I came upon a report of the president of the Philharmonic Union of that city, and I think perhaps an abstract of it will prove interesting to your readers as illustrating the progress made in music in that far off capital.

The Society has been in existence for a year, and the president, in presenting his report on the 31st December last, congratulates the members on the work done and advance made during the year.

Twenty-five Concerts have been given under the direction of the musical chief, Señor Carlos Werner (violinello), assisted by the following native professors: Señores Villena, Caraballo, Arvelo, Magdaleno, Berra, Pérez, Hernandez, and Sbarra; and by the following foreign artists: Messrs. Pringnitz, Prampolini, and Casoratti, while some forty ladies and gentlemen have given their services gratuitously.

A hundred and sixty-one works have been presented of the following composers: Auber, Bach, Bazzini, Beethoven, Bizet, Boccherini, Bottesini, Brahms, Braga, Briccialdi, Calcaño, Carille, Cherubini, Chopin, Dancla, Delibes, Donizetti, Espinosa de los Monteros, Faubert, Faure, Fischer, Gastaldon, Gottschalk, Gounod, Handel, Halévy, Hauser, Haydn, Heinemeyer, Hoffman, Holger Dahl, Hummel, Lachner, Lange, Larrazábal, Luigi, Liszt, Lumbye, Marchetti, Moszkowsky, Mendelssohn, Mercadante, Meyerbeer, Möller, Montemayor de Letts (Maria), Mozart, Niels Gade, Pujol, Racelle, Raff, Reisinger, Rossini, Rubinstein, Saint-Saëns, Sarasate, Serrano, Servais, Scharwenka, Schubert, Schumann, Södermann, Spohr, Suppé, Silas, Tartini, Thalberg, Tosti, Verdi, Viextemps, Villena, Volkmann, Vollmer, Wallace, Weber, Widor, and Wuerst.

The progress of the Society has been very successful. Commencing in January with 100 active members, by September the numbers had increased to 250, so that the Caracas Theatre not being large enough to contain the 250 families, representing (as the president very naively remarks), in a country where families are so numerous, about 1,500 individuals, it was found necessary to apply to the President of the Republic for the use of the Guzman Blanco Theatre, which that distinguished personage kindly granted.

Among the benefits conferred on the nation is to be reckoned the awakening taste for classical and serious music which is daily becoming more and more manifest.

The financial position of the Society is satisfactory. The library contains the nucleus of a good collection, and a Steinway pianoforte has been purchased, and although not quite paid for, there are sufficient assets to meet the balance.

The only thing one has to regret in this very encouraging report, is that these good Venezuelans appear to have forgotten that there are some composers in England whose works might worthily occupy a place in their répertoire.

I remain, Sir, yours truly,

CECIL BURCH.

TO CORRESPONDENTS.

. Notices of concerts, and other information supplied by our friends in the country, must be forwarded as early as possible after the occurrence; otherwise they cannot be inserted. Our correspondents must specifically denote the date of each concert, for without such date no notice can be taken of the performance.

Our correspondents will oblige by writing all names as clearly as possible, as we cannot be responsible for any mistakes that may occur. Correspondents are informed that their names and addresses must accompany all communications.

We cannot undertake to return offered contributions; the authors, therefore, will do well to retain copies.

Notice is sent to all subscribers whose payment (in advance) is exhausted. The paper will be discontinued where the Subscription is not renewed. We again remind those who are disappointed in obtaining back numbers that, although the music is always kept in stock, only a sufficient quantity of the rest of the paper is printed to supply the current sale.

ARTHUR (Marlborough).—The instruments have not yet appeared in this country.

CONDUCTOR.—There is no book of the kind that you require.

JOHN GRIEG.—See answer to Mus. Bac.

K. F.—The Royal Academy of Music, or the Royal College of Music, would be better than either of the institutions you name.

MISS MIDDLETON.—We regret we cannot comply with your request.

MR. L. BARNES.—The notice of the Wellingborough Concert was not dated.

MUS. BAC. (not Foreign or Colonial).—Thanks for your letter. 1. We do not agree with you on the question of the doctorate. 2. The "learned societies" may be dealt with again. 3. The whole matter of University degrees will probably form the subject of a future paper.

BRIEF SUMMARY OF COUNTRY NEWS.

We do not hold ourselves responsible for any opinions expressed in this Summary, as all the notices are either collated from the local papers or supplied to us by correspondents.

ASHTON-UNDER-LYNE.—On Monday evening, the 5th ult., Mr. J. Buckley Thompson gave a Recital on the organ at the Wesleyan Chapel, Stamford Street. The works played were by Lemmens, Carter, Guilmant, Friedrich Lux, Omer Guiraud, J. S. Bach, Haydn, and Spohr. In all the pieces the effects were highly pleasing. The Recital was varied by vocal selections by Miss Marie Hughes.

BASINGSTOKE.—The Harmonic Society gave their second Concert of the season on the 22nd ult., when a programme of sacred music, including Mendelssohn's Lauda Sion was performed. Mrs. Stanesby and Mr. T. W. Page, with some members of the class, were the solo vocalists. Mr. Arthur Blagrove was solo violoncello, Mr. J. L. Phillips was the accompanist, and Mr. W. H. Liddle conducted.

BERWICK-UPON-TWEED.—On Sunday night, the 18th ult., The Crucifixion, by Dr. Stainer, was given in St. Mary's Church, under the direction of the Organist, Mr. Barker. The solos were given in a creditable manner, and, like the choruses and hymn tunes, were sung by members of Mr. Barker's choir.

BISHOPS STORTFORD.—A performance of Stainer's Crucifixion took place on the 15th ult., at the Parish Church. The work was rendered by the church choir of about forty voices, with the help of Messrs. Fryer and Frost (of St. Paul's), Mr. F. R. Adams (a member of the choir) taking the bass solos. Mr. F. J. W. Williams presided at the organ. The Oratorio was preceded and followed by some special Psalms and Prayers.

BRIGHTON.—A lecture on "English Songs," illustrated by numerous interesting examples from early times down to Sir Arthur Sullivan's setting of Lord Tennyson's "Songs of the Wrens," was given by Mr. Henry Davey, on the 16th ult., before a large audience at the Grammar School. Mr. Davey had previously given lectures upon Tennyson and Shakespeare at the School, and much interest was consequently aroused as to the manner in which he would treat the present subject. The result was highly successful; the lecture itself being specially interesting, whilst the admirable style in which the illustrative examples were sung gave the audience the greatest satisfaction. The vocalists, all of whom joined in the famous canon, "Sumer is y' cum'in' in," were Mrs. E. Payne, Mrs. F. Davey, Miss Manwaring, Miss Cowley, Mr. G. Cole, and Mr. W. Booth. Six of the pieces were encored. Mr. E. Payne sang the twelve songs in Lord Tennyson's "cycle," Mr. Davey accompanying.

BURNLEY.—A Concert-lecture on Beethoven, by the Rev. E. Ingram, B.A., in Red Lion Street Schools, on the 15th ult., was illustrated by quartets and trios of the master, rendered by Messrs. Pennington, Dent, Leach and Fred. Myers. The Sonata in C sharp minor and the Andante con Variazione from the "Kreutzer" Sonata were also included.

CALCUTTA.—Mr. Slater's Concert, on February 9, began punctually at gunfire with Sterndale Bennett's Andante, admirably rendered by Mr. Slater at the piano and the Viceroy's band. One of the features of the programme was G. J. Bennett's "When stars are in the quiet skies," sung by Mrs. Greenhill, the accompaniment for which was effectively scored for the orchestra. The Viceroy's band gave a selection from Nicolai's Merry Wives of Windsor, and Mr. von Goldstein deserves high praise for the manner in which he conducted this and the other selections given by the band. Mr. Slater's chorus of more than a hundred voices was heard to advantage in the "Song of the Vikings," given for the first time in Calcutta. Mrs. Pratt, Mrs. Sinkinson, Mrs. Joubert, and Messrs. Sanderson and Easty contributed to a most successful entertainment. The fact that it has been possible to get a large, well-trained chorus together in the height of the season speaks well for the prospects of the Philharmonic Society which, it is understood, Mr. Slater is now organising.

CHAPELTOWN.—The sixth annual Concert of the Chapelton and District Sacred Harmonic Society took place on the 12th ult., Judas Maccabæus being the work placed before the audience. A chorus of nearly 100 performers, and a band of twenty-one instrumentalists, with Mr. John Peck as leader, Mr. F. Senior at the organ, and Mr. J. Sheldon Hague as Conductor, were the means of assisting to secure the success of the Concert. The soloists were Miss Vinnie Beaumont, Miss Louisa Bowmont, Mr. Arthur Boole, and Mr. Dan Billington. Miss Vinnie Beaumont's rendering of the florid soprano airs elicited unanimous and long continued applause. The choruses and instrumental music were capitally rendered.

CHATHAM.—Messrs. H. C. Tonking and B. M. Carrodus gave an Organ and Violin Recital on the 14th ult. Mr. Tonking played compositions by Handel, Bach, Gounod, and Guilman; Mr. Carrodus solos by Mendelssohn, Wieniawski, and Vieuxtemps. Mdlle. Vagnolini was the vocalist.

CHICAGO.—The Artists' Concert Club gave their forty-sixth Concert on Tuesday, the 13th ult. The programme included Liszt's Organ Prelude and Fugue on B A C H, performed by Mr. Clarence Eddy; Rheinberger's Suite for organ, violin, and violoncello (Op. 149), by Messrs. Clarence Eddy, S. E. Jacobsohn, and M. Eichheim; Rubinstein's Concerto in G (Op. 45), by Mr. W. C. E. Seeboeck, accompanied upon the organ by Mr. Eddy, and vocal and instrumental pieces by Beethoven, Rietz, Dubois, and Donizetti. Miss Mathilde Wilde was the vocalist.

CHORLTON-CUM-HARDY, NEAR MANCHESTER.—On Friday evening, the 2nd ult., an Organ Recital was given in the Wesleyan Chapel, by Mr. J. E. W. Lord, Organist of St. Mary's, Rawtenstall. The programme was made up of compositions by Gounod, J. S. Bach, O. Guiraud, Krebs, Dubois, Batiste, and Lemmens.

CROSTHWAITE, KESWICK.—On the 21st ult. The Messiah was given in the Parish Church. The choir consisted of 135 voices. The accompaniments were played by a band selected from Mr. Halle's orchestra; leader, F. W. Schofield; the organist was Mr. Fogg; the principal singers were Miss Jessie Moorhouse, Miss Alice Bertenshaw, Mr. Kendal Thompson, and Mr. Kinnell; and the Conductor was Mr. P. T. Freeman, of Keswick.

CREWE.—The members of the Philharmonic Society brought the current season to a close by a very successful performance of The Messiah, in the Town Hall, on the evening of Tuesday, the 6th ult., on which occasion the principal vocalists were Miss Annie Lea, Miss Emilie Lloyd, Mr. S. Mason, and Mr. D. Harrison. The orchestra was under the leadership of Mr. H. Nuttall, Burg; Miss Kemp presided at the harmonium, and Mr. G. Young conducted. The very excellent manner in which the choruses were rendered gave unmistakable evidence that great care had been bestowed on their preparation, a fact which reflects much credit both on the members and their Conductor, Mr. G. Young.

DINGWALL, N.B.—A most successful Concert was given on the evening of Friday, the 9th ult., in the Masonic Hall. Provost Ross presided, and there was a large and appreciative audience. The feature of the evening was the singing of Miss Watt, of Inverness, who was heard to much advantage in "My lady's bower," "The Masquerade," and "Afton Water." Special mention must also be made of Miss Urquhart's French Chansonette "Je n'ote," and Mr. Wallace's spirited rendering of the old Scotch ballad "Johnnie Cope." Mr. Gordon in "When other lips," and Miss Paterson in "Love's old sweet song" were highly successful. Besides performing De Sivrai's Fantasia "Balmoral," Miss Ross, with two exceptions, accompanied throughout.

FOLKESTONE.—An Organ Recital was given in the Parish Church, in aid of the expenses incurred in repairing and improving the organ, by Mr. Alfred Oake, on the 15th ult. The works of Mendelssohn, Smart, J. S. Bach, Guilman, Rossini, Morandi, Gounod, Dubois, and Collin were drawn upon for the programme. The Rev. H. A. Wansbrough, M.A., was the vocalist.

GIRVAN, N.B.—Niels Gade's Erl-King's Daughter was sung at the eleventh annual Concert given by the Musical Association, on the 9th ult., when, in spite of the inclemency of the weather, there was a good attendance. The solos were taken by Miss Vinnie Beaumont and members of the Association. Miss McKenna was at the piano-forte and Mr. W. Thompson (Glasgow) at the harmonium. Mr. McNabb (Glasgow) conducted.

HALTON, NEAR LEEDS.—The members of the Wesleyan Chapel Choir gave a performance, on the 12th ult., of Mr. George Shinn's Oratorio Captives of Babylon. The principals were Miss Ada Wood, Miss K. Taylor, Mrs. Taylor, Mrs. Jackson, Mr. J. W. Crosthwaite, and Mr. W. J. Crosthwaite. The choruses were well given, and the band performed its share of the work satisfactorily. Mr. W. Green conducted.

HANLEY.—Stainer's Oratorio The Crucifixion was given on the 22nd ult., at the Old Church, by the choir of the church. Principals, Mr. F. G. Guest and Mr. D. Harrison. Mr. Barlow presided at the organ. The Oratorio was preceded by a shortened Evensong and an address by the Incumbent.

HOVE.—The Brighton and Hove Choral and Orchestral Society gave its first Subscription Concert of the season in the Hove Town Hall, on the 15th ult. The soloists who assisted the Society were Fraulein Marie Lipp (vocalist) and Mr. E. H. Thorne (pianist). In memory of the late Emperor of Germany, the Concert opened with Beethoven's "Funeral March." Gounod's Motet "Gallia," composed for the opening ceremony of the International Exhibition of 1871, followed. In Mozart's Concerto in C minor, for piano and orchestra, Mr. E. H. Thorne at the piano-forte, soloist and band worked together admirably. The choir sang three madrigals, "Hard by a fountain" (Waelrent, 1550), "Under a willow" (Vecchi, 1570), and "Soon as I careless strayed" (Festa, 1541), with marked attention to light and shade. Fraulein Marie Lipp's début before a Brighton audience was a great success. Mr. E. H. Thorne, after his piano-forte solo (Weber's Polonaise in E), being twice recalled, played one of Handel's Suites. The orchestra, conducted by Mr. J. Crapps, gave the Andante con moto movement from Mendelssohn's "Italian" Symphony. The Concert terminated with Dr. Parry's Ode for chorus and orchestra, "Blest pair of Sirens." Dr. Sawyer, the Conductor, may again be congratulated upon the successful inauguration of the season.

IPSWICH.—Dr. Stainer's Crucifixion was given, on the 22nd ult., in St. Matthew's Church, under the direction of Mr. Thomas Palmer, the Organist. The chief solos were taken by Mr. Wigg, Mr. Copeland, Mr. J. Cooper, Mr. Senior, and Mr. King. Mr. Palmer presided at the organ.

LAMPETER.—On St. David's Day, the 1st ult., the St. David's College Musical Society gave its annual Concert in the School Hall. The first part of the programme consisted of Mozart's Seventh Mass and Spohr's Cantata God, Thou art Great. The principal vocalists were Mrs. Ryle, Mrs. Feltoe, Mr. D. W. Evans, and Rev. H. Jones. The choruses were sung with much precision and due attention to light and shade. One of the most pleasing features of the first part was the rendering of Spohr's duet, "Children, pray this love to cherish," from God, Thou art Great, by Mrs. Ryle and Mr. D. W. Evans. The second part of the programme was of a miscellaneous character. Macfarren's song, "Pack clouds away," was sung by Mrs. Ryle to much advantage. Mr. A. W. Wiseman, Mus. Bac., of Norwich, played Beethoven's Introduction and Rondo from Sonata in E (Op. 53) and Liszt's Fantasia on Verdi's Rigoletto from memory in an able manner. He also joined with Mr. Culley in a piano-forte duet, Wagner's Overture to Tannhäuser. The greatest praise is due to the Conductor, Mr. Culley, to whose efforts the greater part of the success of the Society is due.

LEATHERHEAD.—Two highly successful performances of Dr. Stainer's Crucifixion were given in the Parish Church, on Tuesday, the 6th ult. The combined choirs of St. John's Foundation School and the Parish Church (numbering sixty voices) rendered the choruses in an admirable manner, the unaccompanied chorus, "God so loved the world," producing a marked effect on the crowded congregations. Among the soloists were Mr. Alfred Kenningham and Mr. Thurley Beale. The other solos were taken by Messrs. Karn and Phillips, of the church choir. Mr. George Beale, Organist of St. John's School, played the accompaniments, and Mr. Ferdinand Lawson, Organist of the Church, conducted.

LIVERPOOL.—Spohr's Calvary was performed on the 15th ult., in the Cathedral Church of St. Peter, with a large measure of success. The soloists were Master A. Evans, Mr. Dakin, and Mr. E. Grime. The choral numbers were given with much effect. Mr. C. H. Collins presided at the organ, and Mr. F. H. Burstell conducted. —Mr. Arvon Parry's first annual Concert was held at the Rotunda Lecture Hall, on Tuesday evening, the 20th ult. The performers were Miss Ella Herriman, Madame Emilie Young, Eos Morlais, Arvon Parry, Mr. W. H. Marks; a trio of violins and piano, by the Ross Family; and the Brython Choral Society Prize Choir. Accompanists, Miss Pritchard, Mr. Foxley, and Mr. Nisbet. Conductor, Mr. Hughes.

NEWARK, AMERICA.—The Harmonic Society gave Dvorák's Stabat Mater, on February 23. The singing of the chorus was worthy of the highest praise. The interpretation given to the music was full of intelligent appreciation. The final Amen chorus was sung with a spirit which has rarely been equalled by any body of singers in Newark.

NEWCASTLE-ON-TYNE.—A performance of Haydn's Creation (parts 1 and 2) was given by Mr. Dodd's choir in the Elswick Road Wesleyan Church, on the 21st ult. The soloists were Miss Foster, Miss Carrigall, and Messrs. A. Raine, Macdonald, and L. Bellas. Mr. A. Kent and Mr. A. B. Thompson played the accompaniments on the organ and piano. Mr. Geo. Dodds conducted.

NOTTINGHAM.—The fifth annual Concert of the Amateur Orchestral Society took place, on the 19th ult., in the Albert Hall. Mr. Henry Farmer was Conductor. The Overture to Don Giovanni, the second and fourth movements from Mendelssohn's Italian Symphony, "The Funeral March of a Marionette" (Gounod), the pretty entr'acte music from Colombe, and a selection from Carmen were the pieces given. The orchestra numbered about sixty, and of these about a score were ladies. During the evening Miss Goldschmidt gave a selection on the pianoforte, with orchestral accompaniments. Mr. William Wright played a part of one of Handel's Concertos for the organ, and Mr. E. Thorpe a solo on the violoncello. The vocalist was Miss Alice Gomes.

OLDHAM.—The third Concert of the season was given by the St. Cecilia Society, on Tuesday, the 13th ult., in the Co-operative Hall, King Street. The programme was well arranged and admirably rendered. Among the vocal contributions, Bishop's glees "Blow, gentle gales," "Hail to the Chief," and the spirited "Song of the Vikings" brought out to the greatest advantage the qualities of the choir. Miss Chadderton, Miss Ravell, Miss Hartley, Mrs. Wood, Mrs. Slater; Messrs. Charles Chadderton, J. H. Mills, Duxbury, Barlow, Malcolm, and Dearnaley were the chief vocalists. Mr. J. F. Slater conducted, and Mr. J. Lawton was the pianoforte accompanist. Instrumental solos were contributed by Messrs. T. J. Mangan and N. Gambillo, and a duet for cornet and trombone by Messrs. T. Leeming and E. Hales.

PEEBLES, N.B.—A very successful performance of the Creation was given by the Choral Society, on the 16th ult., under the conductorship of Mr. Tate. The three soloists, Miss Vinnie Beaumont, Mr. Gledhill, and Mr. Glencorse, sang with considerable effect, their voices blending together well in the duets and trios. Mr. Damburnan's band gave valuable assistance in the orchestral parts of the Oratorio.

PUDSEY.—On Monday evening, the 12th ult., the members of the Choral Union gave their second Subscription Concert this season. The works performed were Mr. Cowen's Cantata The Rose Maiden and Mr. A. R. Gaul's Cantata Joan of Arc. The principals engaged were Miss Lupton, Miss Marie Rhodes, Mr. C. Blagbro, and Mr. Browning; Mr. H. Heap was the leader of the band; Mr. H. Robertson was the Conductor.

RUSHDEN.—Mr. J. E. Smith gave his annual Concert in the New Hall, on the 15th ult. The performers were Miss Levina Ferrari, Miss Florence Tirrell, Mdlle. Leila Dufour, Mr. Frank May, Miss Adela Duckham (violinist and pianist), Mr. Giuseppe Dinelli (violinist and pianist), Miss Nellie Tailby, and Mr. Alfred Clarke (solo piano). The Concert was much appreciated.

ST. LEONARD'S-ON-SEA.—Mrs. Dyke gave a Morning Concert at the Royal Concert Hall, on the 15th ult. The first part of the programme consisted of sacred music, on account of the Lenten season. The performers who assisted Mrs. Dyke were Miss Lena Law, Mr. William Nicholl, Mr. Harold Savery, and Mr. Herbert Thorndike, Miss Kate Chaplin (violin), Mr. Henry R. A. Robinson (pianoforte), Mr. Victor Gollmick (organ). Well deserved applause from a gratified and appreciative audience rewarded the efforts of all.

STOCKPORT.—A Recital was given at Trinity Wesleyan Chapel on Thursday, the 15th ult., by Mr. J. Buckley Thompson, a blind organist, of Ashton-under-Lyne. His selections were greatly appreciated. In the intervals occurring in the Recital, the choir, under Mr. Bailey's leadership, sang several pieces, the solos in which were taken by Mrs. Sheldermine, Misses Leah and Watmough.

STOURBRIDGE.—Mr. G. F. Mountford gave a Concert at the New Connexion Chapel, on the 15th ult. Miss Legge and Mr. W. Pugh were the chief singers, and a quartet party gave some of Mendelssohn's part-songs, besides three unpublished part-songs, by Geo. F. Mountford. The instrumental selections included Schubert's Quintet (Op. 114) and Beethoven's Pianoforte Quartet in E flat (Op. 16), the executants being Messrs. Geo. F. Mountford, G. Melley, W. Bailey, R. A. Blurton, and H. Webb. Mr. G. Bienkarne played Handel's Sonata in F, for flute and piano.

THORNTON HEATH.—Under the conductorship of Mr. Gregory Hast, the Musical Society gave its second Concert of the fourteenth season on the 19th ult., in the East Surrey Hall. The first part of the programme consisted of Spohr's Last Judgment, the solo parts being sung by Miss Annie Matthews, Mr. George E. Mathew, Mr. William Powell, and Mr. Charles Ackerman. The choruses were carefully rendered by a choir of forty voices. Madame Gregory Hast played the Overture and Symphony, and also accompanied. The second part was a miscellaneous selection.

WARRINGTON.—Handel's Samson was given on the 16th ult., by the Musical Society, under the direction of Dr. Hiles, and assisted by Misses Thudichum and Monk, and Messrs. Piercy and Cleaver, Mr. Driffell (of Liverpool) being at the organ. Both band and choir were admirable, and the whole performance was highly praiseworthy.

WEST CALDER, N.B.—The members of the Musical Association gave a Recital of Fawcett's Paradise, on the 23rd ult. The solos were taken by members of the Association. Mr. Blaikie (Edinburgh) presided at the pianoforte, and was assisted by a small orchestra, led by Mr. James Terry, first violin (a former pupil of Dr. Mackenzie in Edinburgh), Mr. J. Wilson (second violin), Mr. G. R. Raeburn (viola), Mr. J. Hope (violinello), and Mr. W. Jack (clarinet). Mr. James Prentice conducted.

WIMBLEDON.—The Musical Society, under the conductorship of Mr. W. Sumner, gave Handel's Oratorio Samson on the 22nd ult. The solo parts were sustained by Madame Clara West and some members of the choir. Madame West gave excellent effect to the arias "Ye men of Gaza" and "Let the bright Seraphim." The choruses and the accompaniments by a small band were very good.

WINSFORD.—The Philharmonic Society gave a performance of Haydn's Oratorio the Creation, this being the first production of the work in Winsford. The choir numbered eighty voices, and the principal singers were Miss Marjorie Eaton (Ashton-under-Lyne), Mr. L. Myatt (Chester Cathedral), and Mr. J. Maltby (De Jong's Concerts). The orchestra was led by Mr. A. Gorst. The whole performance was a distinct success. Miss Marjorie Eaton distinguished herself throughout by her singing. Great culture and a voice of much purity and firmness were displayed by Mr. Maltby. Mr. Myatt also deserves special mention. The choir did ample justice to the various choruses, singing from start to finish with spirit and precision. Mr. Candlin conducted.

WYMONDHAM.—On Wednesday, the 7th ult., the newly-organised Choral Society gave its second Concert. The Society was assisted by Messrs. W. E. and A. Taddenham (violin), Burton (viola), Hewson, Claburn, and Miss Watling (vocalists), all of whom delighted the audience with their contributions. The chorus of the Society, under the able conductorship of Mr. Algernon S. Wyld, performed several part-songs very creditably, especially Pearson's energetic and popular composition "The Iron Horse."

RUTH

ALFRED R. GAUL.

"The work, like the 'Holy City,' is full of beautiful orchestral passages, while the vocal score abounds with charming numbers."—Bucks Herald.

"'Ruth' is a work of sterling power; its musical form is that of perfect tunefulness combined with simplicity and strength. . . . The composer has grasped his theme in a thoroughly sympathetic manner, and has produced a work which is worthy of the subject."—Bradford Observer.

"Bright, tuneful, fresh, and musicianly—this work will be a great favourite, and will add to Mr. Gaul's reputation."—Birmingham Weekly Dart.

"'Ruth' has been set to music by several composers; none, however, has become so worthily popular as the Cantata under notice. . . . It contains some charming music, and is highly characteristic of the story it so vividly illustrates."—South Wilts Express.

"Full of flowing melody."—Salisbury Times.

ON TWELVE OCCASIONS.

Vocal Score, paper cover, 2s.; ditto, paper boards, 2s. 6d.; cloth, 4s.

THE PSALMS

REV. DR. TROUTBECK.

CLOTH, ONE SHILLING.

The principles on which the pointing has been done are mainly those of the Cathedral Psalter, of which Dr. Troutbeck was Co-Editor, a Psalter which has now successfully endured the test of long experience. The book is not, of course, divided into daily portions like the Prayer Book Psalter, as it is intended for the use of those Christian bodies in which the Psalms are not sung throughout a monthly course, but it can easily be so divided by those who use it.

London and New York: NOVELLO, EWER and Co.

SECOND SERIES.

THE CANTICLES and HYMNS of the CHURCH, pointed for Chanting, and set to appropriate Anglican Chants, Single and Double; together with Responses to the Commandments. Edited by the Rev. Sir F. A. G. OUSELEY, Bart., &c., and EDWIN GEORGE MONK. This work contains a selection of Double (besides additional Single) Chants; together with special settings of "Benedicite," and a collection of Kyrie Eleisons, old and new.

NEW ISSUE IN MONTHLY PARTS, PRICE 7^D.

THE HISTORY OF MUSIC

BY

TRANSLATED BY FERDINAND PRAEGER.

WITH NOTES AND ADDITIONAL CHAPTERS BY THE

Rev. Sir F. A. GORE OUSELEY, Bart., Mus.D.,

Professor of Music in the University of Oxford.

ILLUSTRATED THROUGHOUT.

PART I. now ready. To be completed in 41 Parts.

Commencing with the earliest civilised nations of Asia and the East, the HISTORY OF MUSIC traces the History of Music in the time of the Greeks and Romans; thence the narrative proceeds to the period of the Christian nations of mediæval Europe; passing onward, in due course, to the early French and Flemish Schools, to Protestant Church Music, both English and Continental, to Italian Classic Music, to the Tuscan School and the Musical Drama, and finally to modern German, French, Italian, and English music.

The abundance of illustrations with which the work is furnished makes it one of the most entertaining as well as the most instructive of books. It contains specimens of musical notation dating from the beginning of the Middle Ages; fac-similes of the autographs of many of the greatest composers, and illustrations of the most important instruments from the earliest times to the present; pictures of edifices renowned in the history of music; portraits and monuments of celebrated composers and artists; authenticated scenes from the lives of the great masters; achievements of the sister arts—all serving as landmarks of the progress of musical culture.

"Emil Naumann is no ordinary historian, and the result of his indefatigable researches, embodied in the handsome work before us, will most certainly be extensively read, not only as a record of facts, but also on account of the literary merit shown in narrating and commenting upon them."—Musical Times.

"The illustrations and fac-similes of the autograph scores of many of the great composers will in themselves present a very memorable feature of interest."—Standard.

"Of the importance of a work such as Naumann's 'History of Music' it is difficult to speak in terms of over-estimation. A remarkable feature in the work, and one which has not appeared to the same extent in any former history, is the richness and variety of the illustrations."—Morning Post.

ANGLICAN PSALTER CHANTS

EDITED BY THE

REV. SIR F. A. GORE OUSELEY, BART., ETC.,

EDWIN GEORGE MONK.

This Work contains nearly 400 Chants, which are appropriated to "Venite, exultemus Domino," the Daily and Proper Psalms, &c.; those for each Service occupying a separate page and affording several Series, suitable to each daily portion of the Psalter, from which choice may be made. The Chants have been selected with especial reference to the position of the Reciting-note.

WORKS BY F. DAVENPORT,

Professor of Harmony and Composition at the Royal Academy of Music.

ELEMENTS OF MUSIC.

Crown 8vo, 1s.

"In the space of some fifty pages the reader will find all that is necessary to be known about the pitch of notes, intervals, and scales, rests, time, and abbreviations, and will, we doubt not, also find how much more there is of which he was ignorant concerning these subjects, although he had already flattered himself that he had mastered their elements a long time ago."—Saturday Review.

ELEMENTS OF
HARMONY AND COUNTERPOINT.

Crown 8vo, 2s. 6d.

"This work is intended to meet a growing demand for a more concise and simpler exposition of the Day theory. It includes as much of the science of Counterpoint as is necessary for students who enter for the Royal Academy, Local, and other similar examinations." London: LONGMANS, GREEN and Co.

AS PERFORMED BY THE BIRMINGHAM FESTIVAL CHORAL SOCIETY.

JOAN OF ARC

AN HISTORICAL AND DRAMATIC CANTATA

ALFRED R. GAUL.

"In abstract musical merit we are inclined to regard it as an advance on the earlier work, 'The Holy City.' . . . The choruses are written with much knowledge of effect, and one of them, 'On to the battle, on,' is exceedingly spirited. An 'Ave Maria,' and the final chorus of the 'Spirit Voices' may be named as really charming."—Athenæum.

"As in his other works, particularly 'The Holy City,' the composer writes admirably for the solo voices, and equally well for the chorus. . . . The fact must strongly be insisted upon that 'Joan of Arc' is a work which is bound to be widely taken up by provincial societies, doubtless to attain which end the composer has employed but three soloists, and has given to most usually large degree of importance to the choral work. . . . The 'Ave Maria' is singularly beautiful, and will probably be considered the gem of the work."—London Figaro.

"'Joan of Arc' was last night produced for the first time in the metropolis by Mr. McNaught and the admirable choir of the Bow and Bromley Institute. . . . Obviously written with a special view to the requirements of provincial and other choral societies, and likely to become highly popular."—Daily News.

"Calculated to delight performers and listeners, being full of melody and taking effects."—Referee.

"Must enhance the high reputation of its composer. From beginning to end 'Joan of Arc' is marked by perfect and natural melody, a smoothness that is really delightful, and instrumentation that indicates the touch of a masterhand."—Liverpool Courier.

"The music from beginning to end is of the highest order, both in form, construction, dramatic expression, and religious colouring. Particularly beautiful is the great wealth of melody, which carries with it the impression that it is the outcome of the inspiration and genius of a highly-refined musician. . . . The Cantata is even a more masterly and beautiful work than 'The Holy City.' . . . 'Joan of Arc' is one of the most melodious, refined, and expressive works that has come under our notice."—Huddersfield Examiner.

"No more charming Cantata than 'Joan of Arc' could have been chosen. It abounds in delicious music. There is not a tedious note in it, nor any number which can be accused of impairing the dignity of a composition having a lofty aim."—Newcastle-on-Tyne Daily Chronicle.

"Gives the listener a vivid and realistic impression, its attractiveness being continuous instead of spasmodic."—Bradford Observer.

"The choruses are always effectively written—the solos are extremely melodious; deserves, and will probably achieve, great popularity."—Newcastle-on-Tyne Daily Journal.

"There is a reality about the whole tone of the work that seems to bring every scene in the life of the French heroine vividly before us."—Border Counties Herald.

"It would not be surprising if it attained to even the almost phenomenal popularity of 'The Holy City'; contains a similar wealth of melody and effective part-writing."—Birmingham Daily Times.

"Reading the score convinces us that it is our townsman's greatest production. The music displays more skilful workmanship than any music we have received from the same hands. . . . Could have been originated by none but a born melodist."—Birmingham Daily Gazette.

"A distinct advance upon Mr. Gaul's previous work in cantata form. . . . A constant flow of exquisite melodies and effective choral writing."—Birmingham Daily Post.

"Now with matured experience and ripened scholarship he gives to the town which has received and welcomed his first triumphs his magnum opus, 'Joan of Arc.'"—Birmingham Daily Mail.

"The Cantata, from the first bar to the last, is rich in melody, beautiful harmonic combinations, and clever orchestration. The beautiful 'Ave Maria' is a splendid example of pure and fervent church music, but there are so many exquisite points of merit in Mr. Gaul's latest work that they hardly need detailing. Taking the work as a whole, it bids fair to become a great favourite with all choral societies."—Birmingham Weekly Post.

"A thoroughly melodious work, and should find favour with choral societies. It is not difficult to sing, and contains sufficient variety to keep up the interest to the end."—Manchester Guardian.

Price, paper covers, 2s. 6d.; ditto, boards, 3s.; scarlet cloth, 4s.; Tonic Sol-fa, 1s.; Vocal parts, each 1s. Words only, 7s. 6d. per 100. (Ent. Sta. Hall.)

The gratuitous loan of Instrumental Parts may be had on application to the Composer, and full liberty is given to perform this Cantata and to insert the words in any programme without further permission.

THE CELEBRATED "LISZT" MODEL,

SUPPLIED TO THE

EMPRESS EUGENIE,

FOR USE IN THE MEMORIAL CHURCH AT FARNBOROUGH.

COMPASS, FIVE OCTAVES, C TO C—FIFTEEN STOPS.

BASS—Contra Basso, 16 ft.; Viola, 4 ft.; Eolian Harp, 2 ft.; English Horn, 8 ft.; Viola Dolce, 4 ft.; Sub-Bass, 16 ft. TREBLE—Corno, 16 ft.; Piccolo, 4 ft.; Melodia, 8 ft.; Seraphone, 8 ft.; Voix Céleste, 8 ft. THROUGHOUT—Full Organ (Knee Stop); Vox Humana; Forte (E. H. and Mel.); Octave Coupler (up); Knee Swell; Forte (Vio. and Pic.).

Having four sets of Reeds of three Octaves, three sets of two Octaves each, and one set of one Octave.

This Organ differs materially in its construction from all other Organs, being on a larger scale, employing larger and different reeds, tubes, tube-boards, and other parts, by which not only the quality of its tone is greatly improved, but its power is very largely increased. The first Organ of this class was manufactured expressly for LISZT; and, properly played, will surprise any musician who hears it—indeed, there are very few, even at the present day, who suppose it possible to produce a tone of such capacity and excellence from reeds.

The Case is in the Eastlake style, with folding fall-board, carved antes, lamp stands, and the front and sides panelled. (Used at all the principal London and Provincial Concerts.)

The dimensions are—Length, 4 ft. 10 in.; depth, 2 ft. 3 in.; Height, 3 ft. 5 in.; Weight, 293 lbs. (in Packing Case, 518 lbs.).

"GEMS OF THE OPERAS" CONCERT COMPANY. MR. JOSEF CANTOR, at the close of another season, begs leave to draw attention to the phenomenal success achieved by this organisation, which has exceeded the most sanguine expectations. In such musical centres as Leeds, Manchester, Huddersfield, Bradford, Halifax, Preston, Bolton, Dewsbury, Blackburn, Oldham, and at Mr. Spark's well-known Worcester Subscription Concerts, the reception accorded to this unique and interesting programme has proved gratifying in the highest degree, whilst the Press have unanimously pronounced these Concerts to be amongst the most successful and artistic of those at present before the public. The opinions of such important provincial journals as the Manchester Guardian, Leeds Mercury, Yorkshire Post, Manchester Examiner, Preston Herald, Bradford Daily Telegraph, Liverpool Mercury, &c., embolden this Concert Company in the belief that, should they be able to extend their operations over a wider area, a yet more emphatic series of successes would assuredly follow.

The repertoire embraces Selections from thirty different Operas, including "Tannhäuser," "Mefistofele," "Nadeshda," "Esmeralda," "La Gioconda," "Irene," "Carmen," "Oberon," "Talismano," "Faust," "Il Trovatore," "Martha," "Lily of Killarney," &c., &c.

The personnel comprises from twenty to twenty-five Artists, all of whom are thoroughly competent Soloists. Selections are also introduced from the lighter compositions of Balfe, Wallace, Clay, Offenbach, Suppé, Cellier, Audran, and the Gilbert-Sullivan series.

Mr. Cantor is now booking dates for the ensuing Season, and will be pleased to forward full particulars, specimen programmes, &c., on application.

MAY MUSIC.

THE month of May has been called "The Month of the Poets," for there is scarcely a poet who has not a word of praise for the beauties and charms of this portion of the year—"the fayrest mayde on grounde, deckt all with dainties of her season's pryde, and throwing flow'ers out of her lap around." Not only have the ancient and modern poets praised the month who is figuratively represented in art, as Spenser has described her above, as a sweet maid carried upon the shoulders of two brethren, Castor and Pollux, the twins of Leda, scattering flowers as she goes, but science has immortalised both her and her bearers. Maia is a constellation in the heavens, and these "twin porters," who appeared to sailors in storms "with lambent fires upon their heads," are the zodiacal sign of the month, and are represented as stars of the firmament still favourable to the mariner. The fact will not escape observation that the Church has distinguished the first of the month as the day on which the two saints, St. Philip and St. James, are commemorated, and thus are made, as it were, to usher in the Christian May, as the Gemini did the Pagan. It is interesting to note that in this month there are almost as many Pagan observances preserved and observed as at the time of Christmas. May was the great rural festival of olden time. The joy in the revival of nature, the bursting buds, the swelling blossoms on the trees and hedges, the modest, simple, yet heart-cheering flowers of the field, the happy sights and sounds of rural scenes, glad some songs of the birds, all prompt the grateful heart to express its gladness.

The soul is ready to respond to the cheerfulness of the season. From the earliest days it has been the custom for the youths and maidens to leave the towns and villages for the woods and fields to gather the May—as the blossoming hawthorn is called—and to bind the rural flowers into wreaths and garlands to decorate the doors and windows of their simple habitations with the sweet-smelling plunder of the copses and meadows:—

Youths folke now flocken in every where,
To gather May-bushets and smelling breere,
And some they hasten, the postes to dight,
And all the kirk pillars, ere daylight,
With hawthorne buds, and sweet eglantine.
And girlonds of roses, and soppes in wine.
Such merry-make holy Saints doth queam,
But we here sitten as drownd in a dream.

Siker this morrow, no longer ago,
I saw a shole of shepherds out-go,
With singing and shouting, and jolly chear;
Before them yode a lusty tabere,
That to the many a hornpipe plaid,
Whereto they dauncen each one with his maid.
To see these folks make such joiaunce
Made my heart after the pipe to daunce.
Tho to the green wood they speeden them all,
To fetchen home May with their musical,
And home they bringen in a royal throne,
Crowned as king; and his queen attone
Was Lady Flora, on whom did attend
A fair flock of Fairies, and a fresh bend
Of lovely nymphs (O that I were there,
To helpen the ladies their May-bush bear!)

The customs here described by Spenser in his "Shepherd's Calendar" are for the most part still observed in various parts of the country. In Oxford the "shole of shepherds," or their modern representatives, amuse themselves by blowing horns to welcome the daylight on May-morn. This practice is supposed to be Druidical. There are others of distinctly Christian origin. At Magdalen College, in the same city, the members of the choir mount the tower, and when the clock has struck five they sing the "Hymnus Eucharisticus," composed by Dr. Benjamin Rogers, sometime organist of the chapel. This is done instead of the performance of a Requiem Mass for the repose of the soul of King Henry VII. The vicarage of Slimbridge, in Gloucestershire, is charged with the payment of £10 annually for the maintenance of the custom, which is employed to provide a feast for the chaplains, clerks, and choristers on the day of its observance. The evening concludes with a performance of glees and madrigals in one of the private rooms of the College.

In various parts of the country May games are still kept up, though the dancing round the May-pole has been discontinued as heathenish and superstitious. In a little village of Worcestershire called Offenham, the May-pole is still a central feature in the view, though the May-day observances are of rare occurrence there. At one time a May-pole stood in the Strand in London at the end of Catherine Street, and one of the churches in the city—St. Andrew Undershaft—received its qualifying title from the fact that the May-pole shaft was, when not in use, placed against the tower of the church, and overtopped it in height.

In certain parts of Cornwall, until recently, it was the custom of the young men and women of the place to assemble at a public-house on May eve, and when the clock struck twelve they sallied forth and paraded the streets to call up those who had consented to join them, waking them up by the sound of songs and of music of violins, drums, and other instruments. They walked to some appointed place, where they were expected, and were regaled with junkets, cake, and milk. After this they began the May dance, and so to the fields to gather May. While some were cutting the boughs, the others made the May music. This was done "by cutting a circle through the bark at a certain distance from the bottom of the branches, and, by gently tapping the bark all round from the cut circle to the end, the bark became loosened and slipped away from the wood." A hole was cut in the pipe thus made so that it was converted into a whistle. Each one who was provided with this rustic form of flute accompanied the regular music with "a varied noise shrill and piercing, yet joyous withal." Then they returned, dancing and singing by the way, and, after one more turn through the town or village, decorated certain of the doorposts of the houses with garlands, and went to their several occupations, the day being still young. Many worthy people believe that "May," or the hawthorn blossoms, should never be brought into the house, as it is unlucky. This probably arises from the tradition of the Pagan character of the custom, and the notion that nothing which is of heathen derivation should be admitted into Christian dwellings. Many curious customs are, however, preserved by those who are ignorant of their origin. In Helston there is the Furry-day, derived from the Festival of Flora, observed by many Christian people. The Furry-day song beginning—

Robin Hood and Little John
They both are gone to the fair, O!
And we will go to the merry green wood
To see what they do there, O!
And for to chase, O!
The buck and the doe,
With a heel and toe, rumbelow.
For we were up as soon as the day, O!
All for to fetch the summer home,
The summer and the May, O!
For summer is a-come, O!
And winter is a-gone, O!

is thought by some to be a relic of the old Norse religion. It is not sung until the 8th of May, the day on which St. Michael was substituted for commemoration in place of Freya. Some of the old Scandinavian customs are supposed to accompany the rites of the "Furry" or "fair day." Music formed a special feature in the day's proceedings. The "Furry-song," as given in "The Ballads of the Peasantry" (Bell's Poets) has no poetical merit, but that it has some antiquity may be inferred from the vague allusions generally, and to the more definite question in the second verse—

Where be they Spaniards
That make so great a boast, O?
They shall eat the grey goose feather
And we will eat the roast, O!

which means, if anything, that they were to be pierced with arrows if they came, so that the verse may possibly have been written at the time of the expected invasion of the Armada in 1588.

The Morris dancers, Robin Hood games, the dancing of the Rounds, were all accompanied by music, some of which still exists in various parts of the country. If only our musicians would take the opportunity of collecting such of these old melodies as come within the scope of their experience, much interesting matter might be brought to light. There are many, with and without words, that are as certainly worth preserving as the folk-songs of other countries. It is useless at present to expect any attempt to be made by the Government to rescue these old delights from oblivion. They order these things better abroad, and the musicians of other nations have stores of characteristic melodies to refer to, and upon which an individuality of style may be based. There are songs employed in out-of-the-way places in England for all seasons, of which musicians know little or nothing except by accident. May is not the only month which has its representative music. Songs for all seasons, for all occupations, descriptive of every form of rural pleasure and aspiration, are very numerous. Some are very quaint and attractive as poetry, and are provided with melodies of singular charm. Mr. William Chappell, in his ever interesting book "Popular music in the olden time," has given to the world a collection of great worth, as showing the wide-spread distribution of popular song in many ages. Some of the May songs therein preserved are full of beauty. Every-day experience shows that in the collection of traditional melodies occasionally heard in rural districts there is much more to be done. Those who wish to prove the existence of the popular love for music, as expressed in song, might lend a helping hand towards the gathering together of the widely distributed fragments. They might show the presence of a national style, or, at all events, might present a means whereby that style could be formed, if it cannot be proved to exist already. The hand of time is rapidly obliterating these out-of-the-way ditties from the memories of the people by whom they were long cherished. An effort should be made to rescue what is left. The world of musical art may not be much the better, but it cannot certainly be at any disadvantage for their preservation.

Take, for an additional example, what has been done in the way of gathering together the old Christmas carols. The efforts of those who of late years have turned their attention to the subject has resulted in a series of monumental collections. There are other fields still unexplored.

There are many songs which were formerly sung by the "Mayers" in different localities, the words of which are preserved, though all enquiries concerning the music have been as yet quite fruitless. Of these the most poetical begin :—

Come, lads, with your bills,
To the woods let's away;
We'll gather the boughs,
And we'll celebrate May.

If we should wake you from your sleep,
Good people, listen now,
Our yearly festival we keep,
And bring a May-thorn bough.
On the Mayers deign to smile,
Master, mistress, hear our song,
Listen for a little while,
We'll not detain you long.

Is the "Mayers' song," here subjoined, the only complete specimen of its kind extant? This, though called the "Hitchin Mayers' song," from its having been first sent from that place to William Hone, who printed it in his "Every-Day Book," is often heard in other places, not only in Hertfordshire, but in Berkshire, Oxfordshire, Essex, Cambridgeshire, Devonshire, and perhaps elsewhere. It is sung by little children, who carry a May-coach, as their framework covered with Spring flowers is called. Sometimes the song is accompanied by pipe and tabor, sometimes it is sung without such musical aid. The sweetness of the melody is much enhanced by the shyness of the singers, who chant the tune.

Remember us poor Mayers all,
And thus we do begin
To lead our lives in righteousness,
Or else we die in sin.
We have been rambling all this night,
And almost all the day,
And now returned back again
We have brought you a branch of May.
A branch of May we have brought you,
And at your door it stands,
It is but a sprout, but it's well budded out,
The work of our Lord's hands.
The hedges and trees they are so green,
With sunshine's light and heat,
Our heavenly Father watered them
With His blessed dew so sweet.
The heavenly gates are open wide,
Our paths are beaten plain,
And if a man be not too far gone
He may return again.
The life of man is but a span,
It flourishes like a flower,
We are here to-day, to-morrow gone,
And withered in an hour.
The moon shines bright, and the stars give a light:
A little before it is day.
So God bless you all, both great and small,
And send you a joyful May.

THE MINOR NOTATION OF THE TONIC SOL-FA SYSTEM.

BY WILLIAM POLE, F.R.S., Mus. Doc.

WITHOUT entering into any discussion on the general merits or demerits of the "Tonic Sol-fa" system of musical notation, we cannot ignore the fact that it is largely in use, and forms an important element of musical education in this country, for which reason any questions regarding it must have interest for a large circle of musicians.

Now it happens that a question, partly theoretical and partly practical, has lately arisen on no less important a matter than the mode of applying this system to the minor mode, which must affect a large portion of the music in which the system is used. In the major scale, the key-note is always called Doh, but in the minor scale the present practice is to use the syllables as if the music were in the relative major, so calling the third Doh, and the key-note Lah.

This practice has been objected to, and in February, 1887, Mr. Sedley Taylor, M.A., of Cambridge, who is well-known for his able writings on other points of musical theory, gave a lecture to the Association of Tonic Sol-fa Choirs, strongly pointing out what he considered the inconsistency of the present practice.

His argument was as follows:—First, he quoted passages from the most eminent advocates and practitioners of the Tonic Sol-fa method, to show that they consider that the "main principle of true teaching is the recognition of the key-note," of a "central or key-sound on which the other sounds are attendant," of "a governing or key tone, about which all the tones of the scale group themselves";—secondly, he asserted that the minor scale had an independent status, and was not to be regarded as merely a subsidiary appendage to its relative major;—and thirdly, he argued that if these two premises were correct, the key-note or tonic of the minor scale ought to be treated in the same way as that of the major scale, and characterised by the syllable Doh. To do otherwise, he said, was to depart from the ruling principle of the system clearly embodied in the name Tonic Sol-fa.

This argument certainly appeared reasonable. Mr. Sedley Taylor's lecture was printed and widely circulated by the Tonic Sol-fa authorities, and I am not aware that the logical force of his reasoning has ever been seriously impugned. But, strange to say, it has not convinced the Tonic Sol-fa practical men, who, I believe, one and all, have resolutely maintained the superiority of their present form of minor notation.

This is a singular fact, and it offers, to my mind, a very curious problem—how to account for the position taken up by the practical men in the face of what would appear to be conclusive arguments derived from their own data. I believe some light may be thrown upon it by a reference to musical history. I have found that in many other enquiries respecting musical forms, a reference to their origin and growth has tended to clear up much error and misunderstanding in regard to their nature and essential meaning; and we may at least try what a similar line of investigation will do in this case. Let us see how the Tonic Sol-fa notation originated, what it was originally intended for, and by what steps it has assumed its present shape.

The originator of the system was a monk named Guido, of the monastery of Arezzo in Tuscany, who lived at the end of the tenth century.* At that time the material from which music was made consisted of the diatonic scale of tones and semitones derived from the Greeks, and similar to our own, but without any idea of key or tonality at all corresponding to that prevalent in modern music. When Guido was sitting one evening at Vespers in his chapel he heard a certain Hymn to St. John the Baptist being sung by the choir, and he remarked that the first note of each succeeding line was exactly one degree of the diatonic scale above that of the line before it, so that these first notes formed an ascending series. Moreover, he remarked that the first note of the fourth line was a semitone above that of the third line, whereas all the rest were whole tones. Expressed in our modern notation, the first notes might be represented thus:—

Now it occurred to Guido that if he were to take this simple series of notes as a formula, and apply them to the various music that was to be sung, he would be able to show perfectly where the tones and where the semitones occurred, which was the great perplexity and difficulty in reading the music from the notation of the period. This notation, which had been introduced by the Romans at an early period, and perfected by Gregory some centuries before Guido lived, employed, as we in England do now, the Latin letters A, B, C, D, E, F, G to name the various sounds in an octave of the diatonic scale, at a fixed pitch, which probably did not differ much from that of modern days.

But this naming of the notes, according to a fixed pitch, did not suit Guido's purpose. He wanted his formula to represent the same succession of tones and semitones at whatever pitch they might be sung; and he sought for some means of naming the notes of his formula, which should accordingly be independent of absolute pitch altogether. Here a bright idea occurred to him. What could be better for his purpose than the very syllables of the hymn to which he had heard the notes sung? The words of the hymn have been published in almost every musical history. The first syllables in question were—and this became Guido's formula.

This, it is clear, might be sung at any pitch desired, without any regard to the A, B, C, or fixed symbols: thus (still using our modern notation)— would all be applications of the formula, the essential thing being that the succession of tones and semitones should be the same in all.

It happened long afterwards that some European nations, who were not content with the pitch denominations established by Gregory, took a fancy to substitute Guido's syllables for them. And as in the established diatonic scale the notes C, D, E, F, G, A happened to coincide with Guido's formula, they called these fixed notes by Guido's movable names, thereby distorting his invention, and causing us moderns no end of unnecessary heart-burning.

* See Rowbotham's "History of Music," Vol. III.

This formula, then, would apply to any chant within the six notes, and the boys, seeing the written syllables, found it easy to sing anything from them, having specially to remember that between Mi and Fa there was only a semitone, whereas there were tones between all the others. Guido made arrangements for the extension of his system, but the six notes in question formed the essence of his principle.

But there was another feature of Guido's invention which is more important to our present object. His formula was not only independent of absolute pitch, but it was also independent of definite tonality. It had no reference to any "Key," as the modern idea of "key-relationship" did not come into existence until many centuries after Guido's day. It is essential, therefore, to thoroughly understand that the lowest note of his formula, Ut (or what has been transformed into the modern "Doh"), did not represent a key-note in any modern sense of the term.

There were, indeed, certain "modes" in that day, each of which had one note more important than the rest; but Guido's formula had no reference to them, and its lowest note did not correspond to the important note of any mode then used.

We may now see pretty exactly what this prototype of the Sol-fa system really was. It was independent of absolute pitch, and it had nothing to do with key-relationship. It was simply a formula representing a diatonic succession of notes, having certain definite positions in regard to each other, which could be easily identified and reproduced in singing by the mnemonic aid of the simple syllabic names.

This was Guido's invention, and it appeared to him so important for the interests of music that, with the enthusiasm characteristic of his order and of his time, he gave it out as a direct inspiration from Saint John himself, whose hymn had been instrumental in revealing it to him.

Now, when the authors of the present Tonic Sol-fa system took up Guido's invention, they found a different state of things existing. The vague nature of the scale had disappeared by the universal adoption of the Greek Lydian mode (as our modern major), bringing with it the new features of harmony and of tonality. It was found that Guido's original six notes existed intact, and the subsequent addition of one other had completed the diatonic octave.

It was also seen that the first of Guido's notes (the name of which was altered from Ut to Doh, as giving a better vowel to sing) now represented the all-important "tonic," or "key-note," to which all the others had been caused to bear marked and definite subordinate relations.

Here, therefore, this key-relation became added to the former relations between the notes themselves, giving increased vigour to the whole system and considerably aiding its mnemonic power and usefulness.

This resulted of itself from the general musical change. But there had also now arisen another element of a new character. Guido's system only provided for diatonic passages, but now chromatic notes were in use, and the authors of the modern Tonic Sol-fa system endeavoured to make it provide for these chromatic notes, by changes in the vowel of the name used. This gradually extended until a full chromatic scale was obtained. The diatonic scale being represented in the Anglicised forms thus:—

the chromatic or altered notes were added somewhat in the following manner—

I find some slight variations in the orthography of these symbols, but the general nature of the additions will be easily understood.

Let us now turn back to the question at issue. The argument on which Mr. Sedley Taylor lays the greatest stress is, that the minor mode is really an individual and separate thing and not merely a variation of or an appendage to the major mode. This is undoubtedly true. Originally there were seven "forms of the octave,"* all separate and independent. Our present major mode is one of them, and our present minor mode is another of them. On this ground, considering the importance attached by the Tonic Sol-fa authorities to the key-relations, he insists that the minor key-note ought to be made "Doh." It is true that the relations of the notes to the tonic would not then be the same as in the major scale, and therefore the old Guidonian formula would not apply, but this, Mr. Taylor considers, might be easily provided for by the modern chromatic syllables.

Thus, taking the normal or unaltered form, he would intone it as follows:—

But, as we have said, the Tonic Sol-fa authorities, in spite of these theoretical considerations, still prefer to intone it thus:— making "Doh," not the key-note, but the third.

Now, as we may give these dissentients credit for being intelligent and experienced musicians who know their own business, we ought to find some good reason for their decision, and I believe this reason is explained by the historical considerations above given. Their action seems to have been prompted by an appreciation of the great practical value of the old simple diatonic Guidonian principle, which formed the basis of their system, and by a desire not to depart from it to any greater extent than is absolutely necessary.

Guido's formula, as we have seen, had nothing to do with tonality or key-relationship; it expressed only the relations of a particular series of notes between themselves, without reference to the peculiar importance of one in particular; and the Tonic Sol-faists appear to consider that when they find that series of notes existing, the simplest and easiest thing to do is to characterise it by Guido's formula, no matter what "key" or "mode" it may have reference to.

As to calling in the aid of the chromatic syllables, the practical men may say that this is wandering too far away from the original principle without sufficient reason, and that the usefulness of the system depends largely on its integrity and its simplicity. The chromatic syllables, they may urge, were invented, and intended, to provide only for accidental departures from the diatonic scale; and that wherever that scale is found intact, the original formula is its proper interpreter.

In order to test a principle, it is sometimes worth while to see how it would act if carried out to its full extent. Let us try the experiment in this case. The minor mode is not the only one beside the major which has an independent status. There are five others, which are often considered obsolete, but some of them have been partially used in modern days, and it is not improbable that they might, to some extent, come into use again. Suppose they did, how would the Tonic Sol-fa system be applied to them? We will take the three most important, and try the two systems, adding the major and minor for the sake of comparison.

Lydian Mode (modern major).

By the Tonic method.

By the Guidonian method.

Hypodorian Mode (modern minor).

Phrygian Mode (first Church Mode).

Dorian Mode (third Church Mode).

Hypophrygian Mode (seventh Church Mode).

Now, judging by the practical decision of the Sol-faists on the minor scale, I suppose they would prefer the right-hand settings. These keep in each case entirely to the seven simple syllables in the purity of their original musical significance, and preserve always the strict diatonic character of the nomenclature.

The left-hand settings comply with the condition that the "Doh" should be always placed upon the key-note; but it is questionable whether this condition would ensure the object aimed at—i.e., the effective definition of the key-relationship, in any case except that of the major scale. For when we come to compare the tonal qualities of the different "forms of the octave," we should find that the tonality which attaches so remarkably to modern music, and which we are in the habit of thinking so indispensable, is, in its full significance, confined to the Lydian mode. The minor mode, in its true normal form, loses much of its tonal analogy with the major, this analogy being chiefly kept up by the abnormal alteration of some of its notes. And when we get into the other modes the modern key-relationship vanishes almost entirely, and new forms of tonality come in of a different nature.

Helmholtz, in a passage quoted by Mr. Sedley Taylor, makes a remark which is very pertinent to this point. He says: "The series Lah, Te, Doh, &c., very soon acquires, for singers who have been trained upon it, the significance of a second principal series (Hauptreihe)." The word Hauptreihe clearly refers to any of the model "forms of the octave," and the opinion that the Guidonian intonation of any one of these will tend to impress on the pupils the peculiar nature of its tonality, embodies a new and striking idea.

Mr. Sedley Taylor would say that the right-hand plan becomes a "fixed Doh" and so is treacherously betraying the system into the hands of the enemy. It is true that the "Doh" on this plan does become fixed in a certain sense, but not as Hullah and Macfarren fix it. It is not fixed as regards absolute pitch, for the Doh may be on any note whatever. The only condition is that it be fixed as regards the positions of the tones and semitones in the diatonic scale, which is quite a different thing from what is usually known as the "fixed Doh." It is fixed as Guido fixed it, and this fixity was undoubtedly, in those days, its chief merit.

Whether this is the case for its modern use, under the new circumstances of tonality, is exactly the point in dispute. I offer no opinion on the matter myself, having no special acquaintance with the working of the Tonic Sol-fa system; I have only tried, by the aid of history, to show that those who do know it are not exercising a merely factious opposition to the theoretical views which have been so ably set before them, but may have at least some reasonable ground for their faith and practice.

Their weak point is, I conceive, that their writers have, in their estimate of key-relationship, made its significance too wide and too general, being obliged to abandon it as the ruling element of their nomenclature the moment it departs from the Lydian mode. Mr. Sedley Taylor has come down upon them for this inconsistency, and I think rightly.

By JOSEPH BENNETT.

No. XXIV.—HÉROLD (concluded from page 209).

IN his biography of Hérold, M. Jouvin institutes a comparison of some interest between "Zampa" and the work ("Le Pré aux Clercs") which has now to come under our observation. He remarks:—

"Le Pré aux Clercs" and "Zampa" have divided musicians. It was very difficult to establish a parallel between the two works. The first is a musical comedy which becomes more serious towards the end; the second is a fantastic drama, lighted up here and there with the smiles of Italian music. To prefer 'Zampa' to 'Le Pré aux Clercs,' or, on the contrary, to incline towards this rather than towards that, is therefore an affair of sentiment, of temperament, in which the rules of the beautiful, the true, and the grand in art cannot guide and fix our judgment with certainty. One is able to say that in 'Zampa' there is more passion, power, and strength; but, on the other hand, more unity of perfection and colour in 'Le Pré aux Clercs,' but to do this is not to solve the difficulty of giving preference to one or other of the two masterpieces born in the maturity of the composer. 'Zampa,' translated and played in Germany and Italy, became popular from the first with our neighbours on the other side of the Rhine and the Alps. With us it was a question, judging the work to be denationalised and disclassed on a stage where frippery achieves success with greater ease, to give it to the Opera as its natural place. For that it would have sufficed to set the dialogue in recitative. The idea of such a transformation occurred, I believe, to Adolphe Nourrit, who was much in love with the part of the Don Juan corsair. Rossini, who had great regard for Hérold, and under all circumstances spoke of him with esteem and admiration, more willingly called him the author of 'Zampa' than of the 'Pré aux Clercs,' marking thus a preference for the first of the two works over the second. On the other hand, our temperament is better suited, perhaps, by the lighter and more French qualities of the 'Pré aux Clercs' (I refer here to the first two acts; the third act changes the character of the smiling and spirituelle comedy, and is a grand stroke of the wing which opens up new horizons to the musician's inspiration). Not long ago I talked with the doyen of French musicians, that old man always lovable and always young. Our conversation touched the delicate and undecided question, which divides, and probably always will divide, the admirers of 'Zampa' and 'Le Pré aux Clercs.' I ranged myself frankly among the first. M. Auber would not pronounce between the two masterpieces, but with characteristic tact, good sense, and feeling, made me to understand that if there be more of spirit, breadth, and grandeur in 'Zampa,' the author of 'Le Pré aux Clercs,' without losing any of the originality and suppleness of his talent, had to struggle, in the second poem, against difficulties which, unhappily, the public do not take into account. 'In drama,' said to me the author of the 'Domino Noir,' 'the musician is carried away, whether he likes it or not, by his team; in comedy he himself must drag the carriage; it may even happen that, instead of being placed before, he is put behind, and then he can push the harder.' The comparison is admirable in its delicacy and truth."

"Le Pré aux Clercs," after much trouble and difficulty in finding proper artists, and in perfecting the representation so as to satisfy the composer, was produced December 15, 1832. Its première took place amid a scene of extraordinary enthusiasm. The work triumphed "all along the line," and, when the name of the composer was announced after the curtain fell, as is the French fashion, two thousand voices demanded that Hérold should appear. The actor who had made the announcement retired in search of the fortunate musician, presently returning with a grave face and serious manner that commanded silence. "Messieurs," said he, "M. Hérold is not in a condition to present himself before you." That was true enough. The excitement of the evening and the tumult of a great success had been too much for his enfeebled health. He hastened home, laurel-crowned, but with death at his elbow. Scarcely had he embraced his rejoicing family before blood poured from his mouth, and Hérold was carried to a bed whence he was destined never more to rise.

Hérold survived his greatest triumph less than five weeks. Meanwhile "Le Pré aux Clercs" continued its successful course, and the thoughtless Parisians, absorbed in enjoyment of it, took small heed of the composer's condition. They did not anticipate danger. Hérold had just given proof of strong vitality, as was thought; and he was but forty-two years old. Why should he die? He had no business to die. But pallida Mors knocks impartially not only at the mansion of the great and at the hovel of the poor, but at the dwelling of the youth, the strong man, and the aged. Hérold's time was up and the summons came in due course. The news of his departure struck Paris like a thunder-bolt. At first it was not credited, and when the Opéra Comique was found to be closed a journal of the day attributed the fact to a false and shameful report. The next evening, the audience of "Le Pré aux Clercs" saw the actors gather round a bust of the composer, and heard one of their number, Pouchard, recite elegiac lines by Leon Halévy, some of which may be translated thus:—

Young in age and old in success,
He died at forty years . . .
His last chord was his expiring sigh.
Hérold, take thy flight to another land.
Thou wilt find above, by fate reunited,
Cimarosa, Weber, children of genius,
Like thee, dead in life's young spring,
Like thee, in death victorious.

The master's funeral took place January 21, 1833, and was of a public character, consistent with the general mourning that reigned around. A friend of Hérold, the pianist Chaulieu, has thus described the scene:—

"An immense procession, comprising friends and artists of all kinds, joined the musicians of the Opéra Comique and the Opéra, in escorting the body to the church at Neuilly. There several pieces were performed, mostly taken from his (Hérold's) works. The prayer in "Zampa" produced such an effect that the emotion was general. From the church, the procession moved along the outer Boulevards to the cemetery of Père la Chaise, where a vault had been prepared not far from Méhul, his master and friend. A circumstance beyond the control of those who arranged the funeral prevented its passing the theatre where the musician had acquired his glory and where a last act of homage awaited him. The Academy, which had been ready to receive him into its ranks, was represented, in costume, by the author of "Montano." Old Berton carried the green palm of the Immortals to place upon the tomb of him who sang the "Pré aux Clercs." Berton should have pronounced the farewell oration, but his emotion was such that he could not get beyond the gate of the cemetery. In coming to render, in the name of the Institute, last honours to Hérold, the old man was seized by sudden feeling in remembering that, six months before, he had conducted to the same cemetery his son, Henri Berton, dead of cholera.

Speeches were made at the grave by Fétis and Saint-Georges, and then the crowd, turning homeward, left Hérold to his long rest. But not to instant silence. The master, though dead, spoke once more, in new tones and concerning new things; there being found among his papers the Overture and four numbers of an unfinished opera entitled "Ludovic," libretto by Saint-Georges. These pieces were complete, and others were sketched so far that their perfecting presented a task of little difficulty. There was no hesitation whatever in determining to finish "Ludovic" and put it upon the stage while interest in the composer was yet keen. Halévy charged himself with the task; the opera was played, and a great success achieved. M. Jouvin adds, with reference to this work: "I shall not enquire how much good fortune was due to public gratitude and to recollection of 'Le Pré aux Clercs.' It is to be presumed that the feelings in question were not hurtful to the piece. In what proportion did this posthumous child of Hérold belong to its father and its god-father? I know not. I have not the opera of 'Ludovic' under my eye, I have not been admitted into the secret of the work done by the musician who, two years later, wrote 'La Juive' and 'L'Eclair' without taking breath; I only charge myself to report, without guaranteeing, a tradition which attributes to Hérold the Overture and four pieces in the first act of this lyric drama."

The reader has had occasion to know that Hérold was in the habit of committing to paper his ideas and experiences of men and things. We have quoted extensively from his very interesting journal, and now it will not be less profitable to glance at some of the documents which were found in his desk, when the hand that wrote them was cold in death. Among these was a collection of separate thoughts upon artistic matters (similar to those of Schumann), entitled "Cahier rempli de Sottises plus ou moins grandes, rassemblées en forme de Principes par moi." The title is jocular, but not so the contents: "He had reflected much upon his art," writes the French biographer, "he loved and respected it, he took a large view of it, and, without attaching to these penstrokes an exaggerated importance, he sketched a theory of the beautiful in music." We will now look at the "Sottises" for ourselves, as we find them in M. Jouvin's book.

"Take care to write for voices neither too high nor too low. Melodies must come from the soul to reach the soul of the auditors."

"Try to find a just medium between the vague music of Sacchini and the vigour of Gluck. Think often of Mozart and his beautiful airs de mouvement."

"Lean always to the side of melodies free from platitudes."

"Examine well the character of the scene; if languor, or vigour, or tenderness, or melancholy, or sadness ought to predominate in each piece."

"In a crescendo . . . begin a long way off."

"In all arts, and particularly in music, for some time past, people are skilful in finishing and polishing without reflecting how much more important is a good general design."

"When the words say nothing, or but little—which is often the case—it is necessary to make a pretty melody in the orchestra with the violins, Italian fashion, repeat it in several keys, with good modulations and mixed up with some striking unison phrases. That makes a good effect, above all in the ensembles, or when there are exits and entrances."

"Composers of the present day seek after the new only to finish the phrases. The Italians do the contrary. Keep away from both."

"Decaim with truth and strength."

"Find themes which bring tears."

"Begin a vigorous air with eight bars of Largo and attack after."

"Great sorrows are silent," observed Seneca. Thus Hero, seeing the floating corpse of Leander, held her peace. He who goes to the opera only to hear the music had better frequent the concert-room. The musical tragedian ought above all to sing, but ever in agreement with the situation."

"Why not use several styles in a great work? A chief priest can sing in the ancient manner, the others in the modern."

"Church music ought to pray for those who listen to it; as said Salieri."

"The greater the auditorium, the less it is necessary to work the orchestra. Think what makes the effect at Milan and Naples."

"Why not, in a grand opera, have a fugal chorus, à la Handel? Why? Because it is difficult."

"Why not sometimes have recitatives for four voices, like Handel, when the situation admits of it? Same answer as before."

In this manner did Hérold express, and the same time fix, the ideas that floated through his busy brain, and it is a thousand pities that few others besides himself and Schumann should not have thought it worth while to make such contributions to the proverbial philosophy of their art.

With regard to Hérold as a man, conflicting statements are made. By some he is described as restless, unhappy, and jealous, and a biographer thus writes: "He was a man of caustic spirit, who had the weakness not to rejoice in the success of others." Another writer says that he "had a caustic spirit," in which, by the way, brilliant and original talkers like Hérold are often tempted to indulge, whether it belong to their nature or not. Evidence is not wanting on the other side, and M. Jouvin contents himself with a sweeping denial of all the charges brought against the character of his hero. Without discussing the points pro and con, we may say that while Hérold was not entirely free from shortcomings of the nature indicated above, he was thoroughly good at heart, gentle, with an inclination to melancholy, the result, perhaps, of chronic bodily weakness; a good husband and father, whose highest social happiness was found in domestic life, and an exemplary citizen. On one point his career challenges the fullest praise. We refer to the admirable perseverance with which he followed up his set resolve to win fame as a composer. It has sufficiently appeared that his outfit to this end was not the most complete. He lacked the individuality of style which, as a rule, accompanies, or forms part of, musical genius, and for some time he inclined now to this school, now to that. Such a situation is eminently dangerous, and threatens the very foundation of success. Hérold happily escaped its graver perils, and, at the too early close of his career, had formed a manner of his own—a secure and congenial basis, on which, had he been spared, he might have erected many a fair and goodly edifice. If genius be, as somebody has called it, "the faculty of taking pains," then, surely, Hérold was a man of genius.

As to his crowning achievements, we cannot do better, if authorities must be quoted, than cite the opinion of M. Gustave Chouquet, Keeper of the Museum of the Paris Conservatoire. Speaking of "Zampa," M. Chouquet remarks: "In a word, we recognise in 'Zampa' the hand of a master, who, to the spirit of Italian music, unites the depth of the German and the elegance of the French school." With regard to the "Pré aux Clercs" we read: "In setting it, Hérold not only did much to elevate the tone of French Opéra Comique, but had the satisfaction of treating a historical subject. We might specify each number, from the Overture—as full of warmth and colour as that of 'Zampa,' but forming an independent Symphony, not built upon the materials of the opera—to the scene of the barque, where the expressive tones of the violas and violoncellos complete the narrative of the voices, and the whole forms one of the finest effects of pathos ever produced on the stage. The work is characterised throughout by unity of style, variety of accent, and sustained inspiration, always kept within the limits of dramatic truth. The great requisites for a creative artist are colour, dramatic instinct, and sensibility. In colour, Hérold was not so far behind Weber, while in dramatic instinct he may be said to have equalled him. His remark to a friend, a few days before his death, shows his own estimate of his work, 'I am going too soon; I was just beginning to understand the stage.' So modest are the utterances of these great poets, who are the glory of their art and the nation!"

With the foregoing estimate, save as regards the comparison between Hérold and Weber, we entirely agree, and we hold that it fairly adjusts the light in which Hérold should be contemplated by those who would study him as he was.

Hérold's works include, besides his operas, two orchestral symphonies, a hymn, the "Transfiguration," for voices and orchestra, three quartets, a scena, with chorus, three pianoforte sonatas, and a large number of caprices, rondos, divertissements, &c., for the pianoforte.

THE MATERIAL OF MUSIC.

V.

THE peculiar character of the instruments employed by the musicians of old forbids any other conclusion than that the accompaniments performed were anything else but a repetition of the melodies sung by the voice. So soon as the principles of harmony were recognised, and a better knowledge of certain of the materials employed in producing musical sounds was acquired, the means to the end desired became increased, and the contrivances called into requisition were multiplied. All the instruments of the orchestra belong to three primary divisions—stringed, wind, and pulsatile. The methods of making music after these means have been derived from the highest antiquity. The basis of the knowledge which we now possess in the construction and employment of musical instruments was necessarily of the most primitive character, and was rather empiric than scientific.

The origin of musical instruments is still veiled in obscurity, though various theories have been advanced to account for it. It is fair to assume that in a primitive state men first thought of the contrivances by which they could strengthen their powers in the pursuit of their daily wants. The bow and the tube were the earliest weapons employed in hunting. The twang of the bow and the rush of air through the tube suggested the means for diversion in the hours of rest after toil or during the periods of enforced idleness.

Nearly every nation on the face of the earth possesses some modification of these instruments, with or without the addition of some sort of drum. In Europe alone have the improvements been made which have culminated in the beautiful machines now at the command of all those who desire to become possessed of them, and who can, of course, provide the necessary funds for their purchase or acquisition.

It is not a little singular that more than one of the instruments in use in Europe were derived from the intercourse established with the Asiatic nations at the time of the Crusades. Now, while these have been improved and carried to perfection by the people who have adopted them, the inhabitants of the East continue to reproduce their instruments almost without change from the patterns handed down to them by their forefathers.

The names of certain instruments show their connection with their prototypes. For example, the word lute is a modification of the words "el 'ood," the name by which an instrument of the original type, a sort of guitar, is still distinguished in Egypt. Milton speaks of the "jocund rebeck," meaning thereby a sort of fiddle. The "Rebab" of the Turks is a three-stringed instrument played with a bow. The word bassoon is generally understood to have derived its name from the quality of tone it produces. Mediæval writers called it buzaine, buisine, buzzing, showing a possible connection with the Egyptian word for a pipe of deep tone, and the drone of the bagpipe, which is Zummarah-bi-soan.

There are four kinds of stringed instruments in use—namely, the violin, the viola, the violoncello, and the double-bass. These form a nucleus of tone which is indispensable in a properly organised orchestra. There is no combination of sound which is so completely satisfying, none so lastingly effective. A quartet of certain groups of wind instruments can be introduced for the sake of effect and colour, but none are capable of so much variety or whose continuance can be endured without a painful sense of monotony.

Composers distribute the fulness of their harmonies among the strings as the most perfect balance of tone. If, as is sometimes the case, the strings are silent for the sake of effect, their return always lightens up the score like a ray of sunshine piercing a dark cloud.

The violin, viola, and the violoncello are each mounted with four strings, tuned a fifth apart. Each has an available compass of three octaves and a half. In the hands of skilful players, for solo purposes, the compass may be extended upwards. By the use of the harmonics, which are produced by lightly pressing the finger on certain points of the strings, a greater number of high notes may be formed. These are useful only to the solo performer. For ordinary orchestral purposes, the compass of three octaves is found sufficient. The violins are divided into first and second. They play from the treble clef, placed upon the second line as usual. Lully, the French composer of the seventeenth century, one who by his earnest labours helped to advance orchestral art and dramatic music, wrote the parts for his violins with the treble clef placed on the first line; from which the clef when in that position was called the French violin clef. The object of shifting the clef was to accommodate the sounds to be employed to the compass of the instrument. This was a practice derived from the mediæval musicians. They were not unacquainted with the use of the ledger lines, but they hesitated about employing them, inasmuch as it would have broken one of the then accepted primary canons of art. The clef was made movable so as to include all the notes required within the boundary of the staff. In the present day no such considerations influence composers, and ledger lines are employed freely both for voices and instruments. The old masters were compelled to restrain their expressions within the limits of artistic knowledge and capabilities. Few of the old writers up to the beginning of the eighteenth century wrote music for the violin, for their orchestral effects, beyond the primary positions. The keys that were in use were capable of being produced without the trouble of "shifting."

It is true that there are violin passages as old as the beginning of the seventeenth century which imply an acquaintance with the art of shifting, but this was a practice not indulged in by the majority of players. The difficulties were known to the audiences of the latter part of the same era, for it is asserted that whenever certain passages were to be given which required the production of the high C, the enthusiastic and anxious amateurs were wont to caution the players to look out and not miss the note—"Gare l'ut."

The conquest of the difficulties of the instrument by several successive players made the way easy for those who followed, and there is scarcely one of the violinists of an ordinary orchestra who is not competent to produce effects upon his instrument which would have astonished the greatest players of two centuries ago, when violin playing was in its infancy. The violin as we know it is the most perfect development of the large number of instruments played with a bow, known to all people with any degree of civilisation.

The parent of the family is supposed to be the Ravanastron of India. Out of this has been formed the Urh-heen of China, the Rebab Omerti and Kermanghe of Arabia and Persia, the Koba of Tartary, the Sarunga and Tarau of Burmah, the Guhue of Africa, the Goudah of Russia, the Gue of the Shetlanders, the Fidla of the Icelanders, the Fithiele of the old English people, the Cruit of Ireland, the Crwth of Wales, the Violars of the Troubadours, and the various kinds of viols which immediately preceded the violin. The derivation of the word "viol" is uncertain, but it is supposed to have been formed out of the word "fithiele." To those folk to whom the diphthong "th" presented a difficulty in pronunciation, the word became on the one hand "fiddle," on the other "vielle," and consequently "viol." The names of all the members of the violin family in present use are Italian. The root-word is "viol" or "viola," which is retained for the tenor violin, the instrument nearest in size to the ancient viol, whence all the others derive their names. This violin or violino is the diminutive of viola, and means the small viol. Violone, the name for the double-bass, is the greater viola, and violoncello is the lesser violone. It is absurd to speak of any instrument as a 'cello, as the syllables only express the diminutive of something. We do not say in English that a certain artist played a solo on the "little," people would ask what is the "little"?

The harp, another stringed instrument occasionally employed in the orchestra, is one of the most ancient instruments in existence. It is mentioned in the authorised version of the Bible many times. The original word is kinnor, but although it is possible that the Hebrews were acquainted with the harp, it is not certain that the word kinnor really means harp. That it refers to a stringed instrument there is no doubt, and the fact that it is translated as harp does not completely establish the existence of the instrument in the form familiar to us all. The Assyrians possessed harps, as the numerous representations upon the sculptured stones conclusively prove. The frescos in the Egyptian tombs also give pictures of harps and players. The general name for the Egyptian harp was bounâ.

The Greeks called the harp by various names, such as pektis with two strings, the Simekion and the Epigoneion had many. The instrument Phorminx, which is sometimes translated harp, is understood to have been one of the many forms of the lyre. The monuments of ancient Rome show very few instances of the harp in its well known forms, the word cithara, which is translated lyre, lute, guitar, &c., indifferently, is a term derived from the Greek for a stringed instrument, but it offers no help towards clearing the clouds surrounding all knowledge of this matter.

The harp has been known in Britain and Ireland since the days of the Phœnicians. It was the favourite instrument with the bards, and a knowledge of its use was one of the three things necessary to distinguish a freeman from a slave among the ancient Welsh and the Saxon inhabitants of South Britain. The ancient gleemen were skilled in its use, and the bards employed it to accompany their recitals of the acts and deeds of the old warriors and kings. It was one of the last of the musical machines to yield to the improvements of modern science. While nearly every other instrument was improved in shape and mechanism, the harp remained unchanged through generations. These changes were not made or adopted until the last century. Its introduction into the orchestra dates from the early years of the present century. Berlioz was one of the first of the modern composers who tried systematically to obtain effects from the harp which should have a distinct influence upon orchestral colouring. He was followed by Wagner and Liszt, who adopted his plan. The Italian composers, Donizetti, Bellini, and Verdi, generally employ it alone, or with sparing accompaniment. The piano-forte, which is a development of the harp, is rarely used as an orchestral instrument properly so called; but it possesses a peculiarity of character so well known that it calls for no comment here.

The wind instruments of the orchestra are numerous and of distinct peculiarities of character. They are the flutes, both small and great, the oboe, the clarinet, the bassoon, and occasionally the cor anglais, or English cornet, and the basset-horn. These are generally spoken of under the comprehensive term of the "wood-wind," in contradistinction to the "brass-wind," which includes horns, trumpets, cornets-à-pistons, trombones, ophicleides, and euphoniums.

The flute is an instrument of very ancient descent, and is therefore entitled to a certain amount of consideration for its respectability.

The many improvements in the flute since the days when it was a simple tube, formed in the semblance of the lamprey or fluta, whence its name is said to be derived, have exalted it from a toy to a scientific machine. It may seem strange to those who know the instrument by sight only, if they are told that the old English flutes in use up to the beginning of the eighteenth century were in form and tone exactly similar to the common wooden whistle still popular with musical youth in many rural districts. It was then called the beaked flute or flûte à bec. It was also called the English flute. The flute, as now played, has no mouthpiece, but is blown or breathed into through the mouth-hole at the side. This method of playing it was supposed to be derived from the Germans; at all events, it was called the German flute when played sideways. It was called also flauto traverso when used in this position. Handel gives it this name in his scores to distinguish it from the common flute, which in his days was extensively cultivated by amateurs. The superiority of the command of the resources of the instrument in the form known as the German flute has led to the neglect of the old flûte à bec, which is now represented in art by its descendant or, perhaps, its prototype, the penny whistle. The improvements effected in the instrument by the addition of keys, and the method of blowing sideways, enable the performer to obtain more perfect control over the harmonics or upper partial tones of the flute, which are of remarkable beauty when well managed.

There are several kinds of flutes, which are variously named according to the character of the tone, but only two sorts are commonly used in the orchestra—namely, the flute already spoken of, which is sometimes called the great flute, to distinguish it from the small flute or piccolo, which is also called by the Italians ottavino, because it plays sounds an octave higher than the notes written for it. When this is employed with moderation, it is capable of producing most delightful results. When it is used indiscriminately, its tone is vulgar, its effects bad, and its character is demoralised.

Musicians of the sixteenth and the first portion of the seventeenth centuries wrote for a harmony of flutes of various degrees of tone. They called their flutes flauti dolci, because of the softness of the tone. The treble flute of this combination also received the name of recorder, and the single instrument and the combination are spoken of by Shakespeare.

The flageolet or flaschinet was a sort of recorder. It obtained its name from the shape of the upper portion, which was like a flask or a bottle. There were small instruments of this shape, but without the holes for the fingers required to produce a series of scale sounds. These were called fiaschetti, or, in English, cat-calls. They could be made to produce most ear-piercing tones, and were frequently employed, especially in Italy in the last century, to express disapproval. From their use comes the term fiasco, signifying a failure, because all things not approved of were whistled down. Those who joined in this form of expression of their dislike who were unprovided with the fiasco or fiaschetto, amused themselves by blowing down the hollow pipe of a key. This practice also has provided a metonymical phrase, which has, however, not travelled beyond Italy. We speak of a fiasco, the Italians say that a performance which failed was received Col la chiave, "with the key."

The oboe, in one shape or another, is found among all European nations, and may also be traced among many African and Asiatic peoples. In olden times the oboe was called chalumeau (from calamus, a reed). The German word schalmey and the English shawm are derived from this root. The origin of the term oboe cannot be found. The suggestion that the French words haut bois (high wood), because it is a wood instrument of high tone, must be rejected as too far-fetched. The plaintive "acid" character of its tone makes it valuable for the production of special effects. It has never lost the pastoral character it inherits from its ancient prototype, and it is, therefore, of the greatest use in portraying rural effects.

Another valuable instrument derived from the old shawm is the clarinet. This is the only member of the family of wood-wind instruments in common use in the orchestra whose origin and history can be completely known. It also is a reed instrument; but it owes its peculiar tone and compass to the employment of different series of harmonics to those which help to extend the scale of the oboe. The harmonics of the oboe are similar to those of an open pipe, and may be represented by the numbers 1, 2, 3, 4, &c. The overtones of a clarinet correspond to those of a stopped pipe, as represented by 1, 3, 5, 7, &c. The clarinet has a single reed, the oboe a double one. The first overtones of the clarinet are at the interval of a twelfth. This limits the power of the instrument in its excursions into extreme keys. Therefore clarinets of different lengths of pipe are required by the player according to the tonality of the music. There are three clarinets in common use which the player keeps beside him ready to hand. These have for their generating tone the notes B flat, A, and C. With these the player has command of all tonalities. His part in the score is written in the key of C, which is assumed to be the normal tone of the instrument. It was invented by Johan Christoph Denner, in 1690. He called it clarinet from a fanciful resemblance of a portion of the tone to that of the trumpet (clarina). It is therefore a solecism to insert the letter "o" in the word, as it makes it a barbarous compound of two languages—clarion from the English poetical word for a trumpet, and "et" as an Italian diminutive.

Mozart endeavoured to popularise the instrument by writing many solos for it, and by introducing it into his symphonic scores. It made its first appearance in London in the opera orchestra at the instance of J. Christian Bach, who wrote special parts for a pair of clarinets in his opera "Orione, ossia Diana vendicata," produced in 1763.

The bassoon is another instrument of ancient descent and of Eastern origin. It was known in England by many names, seemingly according to the fancy of the describer. Thus it is called Buisine and Buzaine, probably from its Eastern name; Bombard, from its deep and buzzing sound, and later, when improvements had been made whereby its length was shortened by folding over, it received the name of Courtal. The term fagotto was given to the improved bassoon made by Afranio of Ferrara in 1540. He discovered a method by which the instrument could be made more under the command of the player without any loss of its depth of tone. This was by folding over the length of tube required for the production of deep sounds, and as the instrument had then the appearance of a bundle, it was called fagotto, the Italian for a bundle. In the orchestra all these wind instruments are employed in pairs with the exception of the piccolo flute, which is used alone.

The cor anglais and the basset-horn are deep-toned instruments of the oboe and clarinet type, which are occasionally employed in the orchestra when special effects are required.

THE GLASGOW EXHIBITION ODE.

IN the absence of particular information regarding musical arrangements at the Glasgow Exhibition, the opening of which is now near at hand, we can only invite the notice of our readers to the work composed by Dr. Mackenzie for the inaugural ceremony. It was right and proper that two Scots should be associated in this production as poet and musician, and it was fortunate that the services of Mr. Robert Buchanan were available in the first-named capacity. Mr. Buchanan has written a very spirited Ode, in the form principally of an invocation to the city on the Clyde, the principal idea being that of two Covenants strong in contrast—the first connected with war and hate:—

Fierce as an eagle's shriek was heard
The Covenanter's cry—

the second connected with peace and love—

Thy second Covenant is sworn In sacramental peace.

Such is the leading thought of the poem, and connected therewith are expressions of praise and thanksgiving, and vigorous descriptive passages having reference to the blessings of labour. We doubt whether Dr. Mackenzie could have been better provided with a poetic basis for his music—one reason among several why we regret that the work, as a whole, serves but a particular and evanescent occasion. The composer has written for chorus and orchestra only, and has done so in the broad and imposing manner appropriate to the circumstances under which his music will be performed. Niceties of musical craft are out of place on such ceremonial occasions, especially when a great space has to be filled, and the ear of a multitude to be caught in the midst of many distracting influences. Dr. Mackenzie has kept this well in mind, with a result which will, no doubt, be appreciated in due time. The work opens (Grave) with passages for male and female voices in alternation, ending with a short ensemble, the whole of a dignified character, expressive and striking. A jubilant Allegro, "Lo, raising now the palm and not the sword," follows for all the voices. This is in an appropriately grandiose style, with a few points of imitation, but mainly homophonic, ending with a telling unison cadence. Again, in "City, whose birthright is the sea," the male and female voices are separately employed, chiefly in two-part harmony, after which the grand chorus resumes, and continues with considerable amplification of previous matter, so working up to a massive climax. The Epode, "This is our Covenant," follows, and is set to music of a quasi-religious character, firm and strong as the melodies of the old Covenanters. It leads into the "Old Hundredth" Psalm—the metrical version of Sternhold and Hopkins, with the traditional tune, and so the work ends. We congratulate the managers of the Exhibition upon having acquired a work fitted not only to be a pièce d'occasion, but to stand as a worthy representative of Scottish art.

We regret to observe that, at a time and on an occasion when there should be peace and goodwill all round, Mr. Buchanan's verses are ferociously assailed, not only by newspaper correspondents, but by some newspaper editors. That this is the case strictly on their merits we take leave to doubt. In a few of the letters we smell the brimstone of the odium theologicum (the Covenant is a sore point with some people north of the Tweed), while in other instances the writers are evidently angry that the managers of the Exhibition went to the "Southern market" for their poetry. One of these gentlemen goes so far as to say that "Mr. Buchanan has got £50 for a set of verses the equal of which at least ten poets in Glasgow and thirty in Paisley would have been glad to produce at half the money." Happy Glasgow! still happier Paisley! so richly endowed with genius; but why did not the "able editor" speak of a hundred poets in the first town and three hundred in the second? It would have sounded better and been just as worthy of credence. Here is another specimen of what stands in some Scotch minds for, we suppose, judicial criticism: "The theme of the Ode is a blunder in history and an outrage on good taste. The poem itself, by its laboured piling up of sounding phrases, by its inflated style, by its many lines of mere padding, and words stuck at the end of lines for the rhyme rather than the sense, betrays a poverty of language and idea that renders the production unworthy of the occasion, and will reconcile even Mr. Buchanan's admirers to seeing his Ode consigned to the wastebasket of the Exhibition." Mr. Buchanan has reason to speak of this critic as "my friend the enemy." The gentleman protests far too much, and the only effect of his tirade is to excite sympathy with the man against whom it is aimed, and to send people to the Ode with a disposition to see what it undoubtedly contains—some excellent poetry thoroughly suited to the occasion that has called it forth. Others among Mr. Buchanan's critics will not allow him to be poetical. The practical Scottish mind is excited to wrath because he did not write his verses with due regard to topographical correctness. Mr. Buchanan speaks of Glasgow's "craggy throne," and describes it as "set on the surge-vexed shore," and the critics say, with scornful laughter, that these things are not visible from the bridge. The poet also refers to ships "like angels bright walking a summer sea," whereupon one sapient person remarks that "most of them being steamers seem more like demons." Alas! for the land of Burns and Scott, if poetry is to be thus tested by maps and a stern sense of realism! Mr. Buchanan can afford to pass all such nonsense by.

OUR antiquarian readers may be interested by the following list of Henry VIII.'s band in March, 1540. We owe it to Mr. Percy Furnivall, of St. Bartholomew's Hospital, in the Appendix to whose edition of the "Anatomie" of Henry's Chief Surgeon, Thomas Vicary (1548 ed. 1577), this list is to appear:—Henry VIII.'s private Band in 1540-1. [As a sample of the Monthly Payments to the Band all thro' the Arundel MS. 97, we take those of March, an. xxxj, 1540; and of the New Year's Gifts, those of Jan. 1, 1541. THE Bill to amend the law relating to the Recovery of Penalties for the unauthorised performance of Copyright Musical Compositions states that:—"Whereas it is expedient to further amend the law relating to copyright in musical compositions, and to further protect the public from vexatious proceedings for the recovery of penalties for the unauthorised performance of the same: Be it therefore enacted by the Queen's most Excellent Majesty, by and with the advice and consent of the Lords Spiritual and Temporal, and Commons, in this present Parliament assembled, and by the authority of the same, as follows:—1. awarded upon any action or proceedings in respect of each and every unauthorised representation or performance of any musical composition, whether published before or after the passing of this Act, shall be such a sum or sums as shall, in the discretion of the court or judge before whom such action or proceedings shall be tried, be reasonable, and the court or judge before whom such action or proceedings shall be tried may award a less sum than forty shillings in respect of each and every such unauthorised representation or performance as aforesaid, or a nominal penalty or nominal damages as the justice of the case may require. 2. The costs of all such actions or proceedings as aforesaid shall be in the absolute discretion of the judge before whom such actions and proceedings shall be tried. 3. The proprietor, tenant, or occupier of any place or places of dramatic entertainment, or other place or places at which any unauthorised representation or performance of any musical composition, whether published before or after the passing of this Act, shall take place, shall not by reason of such representation or performance be liable to any penalty or damages in respect thereof (unless he shall wilfully cause or permit such unauthorised representation or performance). 4. In this Act words denoting a male shall include a female, and words denoting the singular number shall include the plural, and the word court shall include any tribunal before which such actions or proceedings may now be lawfully tried. 5. This Act may be cited as the Copyright (Musical Compositions) Act, 1888. 6. This Act shall extend only to England and Wales." This Bill, which has passed through the House of Commons, and is now up before the Lords, is purely local, but it will be found most valuable to those who are now liable to penalties for unwittingly infringing rights of performance. It will be quite within the powers of a jury to award "farthing damages" to the informer, who will probably soon find that "the game is not worth the candle." It deals only with performing rights, but although it does not break down the barriers of international copyright, it is a comfort to know that it is one brick out of the wall.

To our list of extraordinary advertisements, published a short time since, we have now added so many that the selection of a few choice specimens becomes a matter of some difficulty. The realisation of the project shadowed forth in the following, clipped from a daily paper, we naturally await with much anxiety: "Wanted, two gentlemen to complete Board of Directors for a large and important undertaking for the advancement of music in London. Must subscribe £5,000 each. A Secretary is also wanted who can influence a similar amount. The investment is perfectly safe, and certain to produce large returns. Advertiser and friends subscribe £50,000." The next is an extract from the advertisement of a professor: "Two instrumental lessons per week for 9d.; one vocal lesson for 6d. Practice can be had at the same place. Music supplied at one-third price; parcels of 50 pieces can be left for inspection two days. Mr. ——— now drives to give lessons, ensuring prompt and expeditious calls. His pony and trap may be hired at rs. 3d. per hour." Punctuality and cheapness are indeed here combined; but the next advertiser promises also extraordinary rapidity of progress, for we are told that "Ladies, young or adult, who hitherto may have been unsuccessful students of the pianoforte are assured of immediate improvement and ultimate success, even to perfect execution at sight of the most brilliant arrangements." It certainly does not say "at first sight"; but we may presume that this is meant. "Only six months' instruction," it is added, "will enable any lady of any age, whether seventeen, twenty-five, or forty, and who may now have no knowledge whatever of either Music or the Pianoforte, to play the following dance music," and after a list of pieces of this class, the pupil, it is said, will also be competent to "play several difficult solos, and to sing several songs, playing the accompaniments to the latter." As this announcement is stated to be "copyright," nobody of course dare imitate it; but that the services of such a graphic writer as the author of it would be appreciated on the other side of the Atlantic, the following, from one of the "States," will sufficiently prove: "If any man in the music trade thinks or knows that he has a special gift for concocting telling center-shot advertisements, posters, circulars, cards, catalogues, and wants to do such work till he can't rest, let him write us quick."

GREAT SUCCESS, we are glad to know, has attended the second series of musical services in Gloucester Cathedral during the past winter. On the closing evening all available space was occupied by an eager assembly, near upon 3,000 persons, and it is computed that, during the winter, the aggregate attendance has reached 30,000. What does this mean? Simply that 30,000 men and women have been brought within the influence of religious art, under circumstances adapted to produce the greatest and most abiding impression. Every individual of that multitude is the better for it, and it may be that a considerable number of them are persons who, but for the musical services, would not have come within the reach of religious influences at all. We commend this view of the case to any who are timid about the innovation first made by the enlightened Master of Trinity when Dean of Gloucester, assured that the more it is contemplated the nearer will be conviction of the vast utility of the "new use for Cathedrals." Hearty congratulations are due to the Gloucester Organist, Mr. C. Lee Williams, upon the striking success of his efforts. During the winter he was able to secure a good supply of competent soloists, including professionals, who gave their aid without remuneration, like the rest. During the winter too Mr. Williams kept strictly to the wise plan of not going above the heads of his congregation in making up the programmes. While selecting good music he has taken care that it shall be within the scope of general knowledge, taste, and sympathy. Hence the continued freshness of public interest. When the third series begins Mr. Williams will have his enlarged and renovated organ at command, to the incalculable advantage of the general effect. Wherefore we may expect to hear, next winter, of increasingly good results.

THE Opera Company (Limited) into which Mr. Carl Rosa's enterprise was transformed some time ago have not been idle in the matter of providing a London home, and an effort is now making to raise money on debentures for the purpose of building a theatre on a site in every way suitable. That the funds will be forthcoming is as good as assured, and, by the end of the summer of 1889, probably, the new house will stand ready for occupation. The edifice has been designed less for operatic purposes than as a theatre available for ordinary drama, to the service of which it is applicable when the Carl Rosa troupe has left town. At the same time, it will be large enough to contain a profitable audience, calculated on the basis of operatic expenditure. The building is to form a complete block, approachable on all sides, and with exits into four thoroughfares. That it will combine the latest improvements and be in all respects worthy of its mission there is no reason to doubt. Concerning the importance of the new theatre, as a home for English opera, we need not say much. Amateurs know that the want of such a place has kept, and is keeping, the Carl Rosa Opera out of London, the present theatres of suitable size being all occupied, while the great opera-houses are disqualified by reason of their excessive dimensions and the vast expense they entail. With a good theatre of their own the Company should enter upon a brilliant career in town, and provide London from time to time with a form of entertainment which it is disgraceful for the richest city in the world to lack. As at present contemplated, the new house will open with an opera specially written for the Company—libretto by Mr. Joseph Bennett, music by Mr. Frederic H. Cowen.

THE Concert given by the "Magdalen Vagabonds," in Princes' Hall, on the 13th ult., was the first given in London for thirteen years, the last being in aid of the funds of St. Thomas's Hospital. It was particularly interesting as indicative of the admirable work done, and doing, by musical amateurs in unexpected directions. The Association, which consists of past and present members of the choir of Magdalen College, Oxford, has been in existence for a quarter of a century, having been founded in 1863 by the Rev. Compton Reade, one of the Chaplains of the College, the Rev. L. S. Tuckwell, Dr. Stainer, Mr. W. A. Barrett, and a few others. They devoted themselves to the study of glees and other vocal compositions for male voices, by English and foreign writers, and gave many concerts for charitable purposes in various parts of the country, under the direction of Mr. B. Blyth, Dr. Stainer, Mr. Parratt, and Dr. Roberts. By their exertions, schools, hospitals, churches, and charitable institutions have been benefited, and although the members counted in their lists many who afterwards became eminent as professors, yet with this Society they worked en amateur, and so far conscientiously laboured to extend the love for the peculiar forms of vocal music to which they turned their attention. In their own College, in the University, and in the several places each was called upon to minister, the knowledge gained by the individual members has been made the nucleus of a love for the art of vocal music. Those who sang at the Concert in the Princes' Hall proved that the good seed sown in former times had borne fair fruit. The manner in which the glees and part-songs were given on this occasion was extremely good. Floreat Magdalen!

THE series of Services of Sacred Music for the People, which have been held in Norwich, in the nave of the Cathedral, during the past few weeks, have been most successful. The choir, under the leadership of Dr. Bates, was composed of about a hundred ladies and gentlemen, who, with the lay clerks and choristers, have volunteered their services each evening. The result is most gratifying to all who are interested in the movement for popularising a form of service in the Cathedrals. There can be no doubt that the music has been a great factor in the attraction of these services. Yet its ministrations are by no means to be underrated. The "Laudi Spirituali" at the Church of the Oratory in Rome prepared the hearts of the hearers to receive the truths of religion told by the preachers. The music at Norwich was made a portion of the act of worship, and all the congregation joined heartily in the Hymns, which, like the Anthems, were chosen especially for their doctrinal teaching. So highly were these services valued, that at the last—on Good Friday—the crowd, which had assembled for more than an hour before the opening of the doors, was so great that at one time it was feared that an accident would have happened. Numbers were unable to find even standing room, for all the vastness of the building. Norwich, Gloucester, St. Paul's, and one or two other Cathedrals have proved the power of music in bringing the people for awhile to serious thoughts. May the day not be far distant when such services shall be the common practice in all our great and time-honoured structures, and "the whole Realm shall have but one use."

WHATEVER opinions may be entertained in this country of the ill effects likely to result from overworking "child-prodigies," it cannot be said that we so far interfere with the liberty of the subject as to desire to regulate the number of their appearances before the public, or to decide the length of time on each occasion during which their exceptional talents may be exhibited. When Josef Hofmann, the juvenile pianist, was in England, many of the press notices on his performances contained a kindly expression of sympathy with the child, and even went so far as to record a hope that his mental and physical powers would not be taxed to the detriment of his health, and consequent destruction of all his prospects in the future; and these remarks, we have reason to think, had a salutary effect upon those who had the charge of him. In America, however—as we mentioned in our March number—practical measures have been taken to ensure the boy's temporary retirement; yet we believe that the members of the "American Society for the Protection of Children" did more harm than good by their officious care in the welfare of the young artist; for in a morning contemporary we are told that they "scared and worried the boy with incessant medical examinations, which were even permitted to take place during the Concerts, in the intervals of the programme." No doubt all this was well meant; but in reading these accounts we cannot but be reminded of the story of the man who, on being asked how he had lost one of his ears, replied that it was unfortunately dragged off, during the skating season, by one of the officers of the "Royal Humane Society."

No one will refuse sympathy to the committee of the Birmingham Musical Festival in view of the repeated and serious disappointments they have experienced as regards the provision of new works for next autumn. The adage that "misfortunes never come singly" has received in their case a curious illustration, and one which, under the circumstances, may be called rare. Opportunity of writing for the Birmingham Festival is so highly and justly valued that no composer would, for a light reason, permit himself to lose it. Yet we have just seen three composers throw up their commissions, as though under the compulsion of a malicious fate. Dvorák, Mackenzie, Goring Thomas—one after another they sent their non possumus to the bewildered and anxious gentlemen in Birmingham. It is true that, since then, the second has undertaken to make amends for the loss of the third by writing a short choral work—a setting of the "Cottar's Saturday Night" (Burns)—but Dr. Mackenzie's cantata is all that, at the forthcoming Festival, will represent the three important works which were to have been. We are sorry for a sequence of events which must necessarily withhold from the Festival much of the interest anticipated for it, but there is consolation in the fact that the result is due to unavoidable circumstances rather than to lack of good will. This solace the committee may lay to heart should the Festival suffer artistically or pecuniarily from failure to command the usual large meed of attention.

THE simple severity of our Church bills and service lists does not find an absolute following among our American cousins. Their lists, especially those which relate to special services, exhibit no small degree of artistic effort. For the Christmas and Easter Services at Grace Church, Chicago, for example, illustrated devices are furnished. The card for Christmas has a design, printed in green, in which is included views of the porch of the church and of the interior, the latter showing the Cantoris side of the choir—men and boys—with the organ, with a quotation in music from one of the pieces on the list, all fancifully surrounded with holly leaves. The Easter card has a golden cross with a scroll winding round it, on which the name of the church may be read, while in the background of sky and clouds the heads of singing angels are exhibited. It is just possible that the artistic character of the printing is of a higher grade than that of the music, but there is no reason why our musical directors attached to "choirs and places where they sing" should not take a hint in the matter of announcements from "over the water."

ENGLISH journals do not emulate those of America in the matter of "personals," and we trust they never will. It scarcely follows that, because a man is a public performer, the world should be told all about his doings in private life. Sometimes, however, "personals" are legitimate enough, and we now offer a few to the reader.

Mr. Edward Lloyd sailed for America on Saturday last, on board the Etruria, accompanied by Mrs. Lloyd and Mr. N. Vert. On reaching New York he will pay a short visit to Boston and then proceed to Cincinnati to fulfil his engagement at the Festival there. The popular tenor will not sing anywhere save in the last-named city. If successful—and who can doubt it?—Mr. Lloyd will in all probability be heard of in America again.

The Prince of Wales, as Most Worshipful Grand Master of the United Grand Lodge of Freemasons, has appointed and invested Mr. W. A. Barrett, Mus. Bac., Oxon., as Grand Organist for the year, as successor to Sir Arthur Sullivan.

We regret to learn that Mr. Santley has been rather seriously ill, and confined to his bed. He is much better now, and contemplates a voyage to Malta, in the hope that sea-air and a more genial climate will bring, as we all wish, perfect restoration.

The operatic venture of Messrs. Barton McGuckin and Ludwig in New York, though not extending over more than very few representations, turned out disastrously, and Mr. McGuckin will soon be, or already is, back in England, cured, let us hope, of any desire to speculate in lyric drama. Artists have often attempted the work of an impresario, and have always seen reason to repent their daring.

Mr. Desmond L. Ryan, the musical critic of the Standard, has come back to England from Australia, "safe, sound, and hearty," as he puts it, the object of his long journey having been triumphantly attained. His many friends rejoice.

Mr. F. H. Cowen leaves England for Melbourne in about a fortnight from now, expecting to return in March next. He will work at his new opera for the Carl Rosa Company as far as his onerous duties at the Antipodean Exhibition may allow.

THE ROYAL ALBERT HALL CHORAL SOCIETY.

As a matter of record it should be stated that this Society gave its usual performance of "The Messiah" on Good Friday, when a very large audience assembled. The regular season came to an end on Saturday afternoon, the 21st ult., when "Elijah" was repeated. This is the first time that Mendelssohn's oratorio has been performed twice in one season, but the course was justified by the large attendance. Some of the soloists were the same as on the previous occasion—namely, Madame Nordica, Madame Belle Cole (who may be commended for declining an encore for "O rest in the Lord"), and Mr. Lloyd. Mr. Watkin Mills undertook the title-rôle and rendered it with much dignity and good taste. Madame Florence Winn sang "Woe unto them" with quiet artistic expression, and useful work was rendered in the subsidiary music by Miss Julia Neilson, Mr. Arthur Thompson, and Mr. Henry Cross. The prestige of the Society has been fully maintained during the season, Mr. Barnby's splendid choir being, as usual, above reproach. There will be an extra performance of "The Golden Legend" on the afternoon of the 7th inst., at which Her Majesty the Queen has signified her intention of being present.

PHILHARMONIC SOCIETY.

THIS Society resumed its operations after the Easter recess on the 19th ult., when the third Concert of the season took place, and, being one of varied interest, attracted a large audience. The popular "draw," we should say, was the boy Otto Hegner, who is just now what Josef Hofmann was a little while ago—the lionised of people whose interest in music depends upon the amount of sensationalism that can be connected with it. We are not going to rail at those folk under present circumstances, because there is much to excuse them in the really astonishing precocity of Master Hegner; at the same time, there are high and sublimated art regions from which it is desirable to keep all that is merely adventitious or extraneous to the considerations that should alone prevail. How much curiosity and interest attended young Hegner's performance we need not stop to point out, and it is more important to observe that in the first movement of John Field's Concerto in A flat he showed executive powers, especially in passage-playing, that many an adult artist might envy. The child also played Chopin's Study in A flat and Mendelssohn's Andante and Rondo in E, exhibiting in both the same surprising power over the resources of his instrument.

A more legitimate attraction, under the circumstances, was the presence of Mr. Charles Widor, the well-known French composer and organist, who brought over, as a choice example of his skill in the first-named capacity, a symphonic work entitled "Walpurgis Night." Mr. Widor seems to be fond of this subject. He is credited with having written a Symphonic Poem of the same name more than eight years ago, and now he has come to us with another, "composed expressly for the Philharmonic Society," and with the last movement dated February, 1888. Not having seen the first work, we cannot say how much the second resembles it, but are, of course, bound to accept the author's implied assurance that they are not identical. "Walpurgis Night" consists of three movements, the first, Allegro, describing the tempest raging around the Brocken as Faust and Mephistopheles ascend the mountain. The last, also an Allegro, is a sort of fantastic dance, suggestive of the unholy revels on the summit. The second movement has no connection in point of subject with the other two, but refers to an episode in the second part of "Faust," where Helen appears to Paris. Each movement, we should add, is preceded by a slow introduction. Mr. Widor makes a great parade of the meaning to be attached to his themes, bidding us recognise one as expressing the general philosophic idea of the work, accept another as the "phrase morale," a third as the "note sentimentale," and so on. The composer must really excuse us if we decline to attach the importance he desires to such distinctions. Our preference is to regard his music as such, and in the broadest relation to the scenes which inspired it; not to consider it as burdened with arbitrary significances, with which, fundamentally, it can have nothing to do. So doing we see in the first Allegro a movement in orthodox symphonic form, somewhat rhapsodical, as might be expected from the poetic basis, and noisy enough to suggest any tempest that ever raged. The music is highly coloured, and in every respect manifests Mr. Widor's familiarity with the resources of his art, but we cannot discover any very great merit beyond such as properly belongs to a musical builder and decorator. Evidence of imaginative genius is certainly wanting, and the effect upon an intelligent listener is hollow-sounding. In the Andante, however, we come upon music properly so called. Here the composer is within his means, and he gives to the predominating strings many passages full of charm, alike as to the themes and their attendant harmonies, which are chiefly those of real parts. The final movement, or fantastic dance, must not be judged by so high a standard as his companions, and it suffices to say that distinctive melodies help skilful orchestration to sustain a large amount of interest. On the whole, the "Walpurgis Night" was a disappointment, in that it failed to meet the expectations formed of the composer's ability in the highest walk of his art. Mr. Widor conducted with clearness and force, and was applauded with considerable heartiness.

The late Sir G. A. Macfarren's Overture to "Romeo and Juliet" was another novelty, though composed fifty years ago. For some reason or other Sir George withdrew this work of his youth from public notice, despite the fact that it became popular when first made known, and obtained a close connection with Shakespeare's play as its accepted prelude. We think that the composer was quite mistaken in so acting, for the work is one of singular clearness, force, and suggestiveness. It is picturesque withal, and very fairly expresses, as far as is possible to music, certain scenes and personages of the drama. It must not again be allowed to drop out of sight and mind. Other items in the programme of this Concert were Beethoven's Seventh Symphony and the Overture to "Der Freischütz," which were admirably played under Mr. Cowen's direction. The vocalist, Miss Hilda Wilson, was too indisposed to do justice to Prout's scena "Judith."

CRYSTAL PALACE.

It has probably never fallen to the lot of the Sydenham audience to hear so inadequate a rendering of Beethoven's Pianoforte Concerto in E flat (No. 5) as that given on the last day of March. Miss Martha Remmert, Court pianist at Weimar and pupil of Liszt's, has some undeniable qualities as an executant, notably an excellent shake, a powerful wrist, and an absolute freedom from nervousness. But against these must be set a want of dignity in conception, and of refinement in phrasing, which when added to a most infelicitous sense of rhythm, and an irrepressible tendency to exaggerate, produce results little short of disastrous. The orchestra, after a magnificent rendering of the "Leonora" Overture (No. 3), seemed to be demoralised by the soloist in the Concerto. Or it may have been that their inefficiency was due to a natural feeling of reluctance to take part in so bizarre an interpretation of a masterpiece. Miss Remmert was far more in her element later on in Liszt's Hungarian Fantasia, revelling in what may be called the ex ungue scale passages, though in this piece again her accent was occasionally at fault. Spohr's symphonic masterpiece, "Die Weihe der Töne," which had not been heard at these Concerts for four years, formed the central number of the programme and was performed con amore by the band, who when emancipated from co-operation with the pianoforte were quite at their best on this afternoon. The vocalist was Miss Alice Gomes, whose unaffected rendering of Weber's Aria "O Fatima" (Abu Hassan) was so much appreciated by the audience as to lead to its repetition. But mere charm of voice and simplicity of style will effect little in such songs as Mendelssohn's setting of Goethe's Sonnet "Die Liebende schreibt" and Franz's "Er ist gekommen." Here dramatic intelligence, sympathy, emotion are required, but were, alas! conspicuous by their absence in the vocalist's rendering. The Concert concluded with Rossini's "William Tell" Overture.

Herr Hans Wessely, the young Viennese violinist who made his début at the Saturday Concerts on the 7th inst., is an agreeable, rather than a remarkable, performer, the thinness of the tone he produces being his chief weakness. But he phrases intelligently, marks the rhythm with vigour and decision—his fondness for the martellato style occasionally interferes with the accuracy of his intonation in high notes—and is possessed of a good technique. Herr Wessely chose as his principal effort Spohr's Seventh Concerto, in the last two movements of which—the Adagio and Rondo—he gave great pleasure. Wieniawski's showy Fantasia on airs from Gounod's "Faust" seemed rather out of place between Schumann and Wagner, but the performer availed himself fully of the opportunities for musical pyrotechny with which it abounds. The "new" Symphony of Dvorák's turned out, in the date of its composition, to be an earlier work than either of those heard at these Concerts; but the sense of disappointment at this discovery soon gave place to enjoyment born of the many beauties of the work. Dvorák's inexhaustible faculty for coining new and delightful melodies is most happily shown throughout this Symphony, rightly denominated "transitional" in its character by the writer of the analytical remarks in the programme. The same authority communicates the exceedingly interesting fact that, with one single exception, the tunes which occur in Dvorák's works are not borrowed from the storehouse of national melodies, but are his own creation. On a first hearing, the opening movement and the Andante are perhaps the most taking. Over the first a breath of Schubert seems to have passed, but the Allegro scherzando, with its piquant dance measure, and the Finale could only have been written by Dvorák. The "Oberon" Overture, which opened the Concert, received a truly noble rendering from Mr. Manns and his forces, the effect of the horn being, as it should be, quite magical. Madame Valleria, who was in good voice, contributed Elsa's Dream from "Lohengrin," Mendelssohn's "Winterlied," and Schumann's "Widmung."

The announcement of the first performance of Berlioz's "Faust" at the Palace attracted a large audience to the Concert of the 14th, not a few amongst whom must have felt sundry misgivings as to the result. An adequate rendering of this work needs the harmonious co-operation of a first rate orchestra, a first rate chorus, and first rate principals. Those who are familiar with the admirable performances given by Mr. Hallé in Manchester, where all three essentials are secured, or by Mr. Barnby in the Albert Hall, where two, at any rate, are provided, realised that the success of this interesting experiment was not by any means a foregone conclusion. To further add to the risks of the undertaking, Mr. Lloyd was incapacitated at the last moment by sore throat, his place being taken by Mr. Charles Banks. While alluding to the principals, let us say at once that the honours of the day undoubtedly rested with Mr. Barrington Foote. If this excellent artist failed to render justice to the smoother and more seductive aspects of his rôle, in its harsher and more sardonic phase he was worthy of all praise, the distinctness of his articulation being such that in his case a programme was unnecessary. Madame Nordica's conception of Margaret, meritorious in its way, leaves out of sight its artlessness—its principal trait. For the solecism of making "Thule" a monosyllable the translator is no doubt primarily responsible, as well as for the grotesque rendering of "The course of the Abyss" instead of "The ride to the Abyss"; but Madame Nordica needs to be told that "leal" is not a disyllable. While we consider her conception of the part to err on the score of artificiality, we are fully ready to recognise Madame Nordica's great vocal merits. As for the choir, it is our unpleasant duty to record the fact that, though they sang vigorously, they were seldom exactly with the orchestra. In the Easter hymn the male voices were quite overpowered, and in several other passages the roughness of the chorus—notably the tenors—seriously impaired the effectiveness of the music. Mr. Manns's tempi differ in some cases from those observed by other conductors, and generally on the side of increased speed. The peculiar rhythmical character of the Hungarian March seemed hardly to be emphasised enough. But in the main the share of the orchestra in the performance left little to be desired.

MR. MANNS'S BENEFIT CONCERT.

If the sect of Musical Radicals whose motto is the exact converse of Vox et præterea nihil had been given carte blanche to organise a Concert for the advancement of their views, they could not have devised a better programme for the purpose of exalting instrumental at the expense of vocal music than that offered for the delectation of Mr. Manns's admirers on the 21st ult. The minauderics of that young lady who, being nothing if not original, discards all distinctive prefixes and veils her identity under one of the slavonic equivalents for Nicholas, whatever other meaning it may convey to her; the melancholy spectacle of a septuagenarian basso wandering about among the ruins of a once great voice; and the eccentricities of an operatic contralto—these were set in the balance against faultless renderings by a splendid orchestra of a great Symphony, a great Overture, and some fascinating Slavonian dances; against some of the most delightful violoncello playing that we have heard for many a long day; against a spirited performance by a young and promising violinist—and it is hardly necessary to add that they were found wanting. This, however, is only an expression of individual opinion, for "Nikita's" efforts were rapturously applauded by the great majority of those present. This attitude on the part of the Sydenham audience is enough to make one despair of the musical republic. On the other hand, while we regret the necessity or the lack of lucidity which has driven Herr Carl Formes to appeal in his old age to the suffrages of a critical audience, we have no fault to find with the generous indulgence extended to the favourite of a bygone generation. Of M. Gillet's admirable violoncello playing we have already spoken. This artist is a consummate virtuoso, uniting a most beautiful tone to an easy mastery of the resources of his instrument. The Concert, which lasted till half-past five, was concluded by the "Scotch" Symphony. Not a few amongst those present must have blessed Mendelssohn in their heart of hearts for contributing an anodyne so potent as even to soothe the mingled feelings aroused by the ineptitudes of "Nikita." The possession of a sympathetic and tuneful voice does not justify the adoption of the antics of a columbine. On the contrary, it only aggravates the offence—Corruptio optimi pessima.

THE HERKOMER STAGE-PLAY.

EVERYBODY knows that Professor Hubert Herkomer, A.R.A., has established a school of his art in the little Hertfordshire village of Bushey, and that working in his studios there are some sixty pupils, male and female. With this institution as a school of painting we have nothing here to do, but Mr. Herkomer, in his efforts to create, for the benefit of the pupils, a thoroughly artistic atmosphere, has brought his enterprise within the region over which our purview extends. That is to say, he has built a little theatre and opened it with a musical play, invented and provided with a libretto, music, scenery, and every other requisite by his own versatile self. The first performance took place on Tuesday last, in presence of a full (invited) house, and, in all, eight representations will be given, extending over three weeks. For the last two occasions tickets will be sold, and the proceeds divided between the German inundation fund and the poor of Bushey.

Mr. Herkomer's theatre is not a conventional structure. Quadrangular in shape, the whole floor is occupied by what may be termed "stalls," while at the end is a carved oak gallery. The orchestra is placed down in a pit extending under the stage, after the Bayreuth model, and there are no footlights, the stage being illuminated from above, or, when dramatic conditions allow, from the wings. In these arrangements it is easy to trace the hand of a painter who desires that his pictures may be presented under natural conditions as far as possible, and not suffer from the artificialities of the professional stage. It may fittingly be added here that the Professor insists upon naturalness in all things. When the curtain is up, the existence of an audience is entirely ignored, the stage action being determined entirely by the dramatic situation. No performer turns his face towards the house unless he would be required to look in that direction were no house there. As for coming down and singing at the audience, Professor Herkomer would rank such an act among cardinal sins against dramatic propriety. Another point of interest is the banishment of dialogue, the story being carried on between the musical numbers by means of pantomimic action, accompanied by orchestral music. This experiment has proved to be a success; but it must be considered that art pupils, with whom pose and movement are constant studies, supply the best means in the world for realising such an idea. The professor had only to say what he wanted and the taste of the students worked it out in a surpassingly complete and beautiful manner. We need not add another word in order to show the interesting nature of the present performances.

The piece now occupying the Bushey stage avowedly makes no greater pretensions than belongs to an experimental effort. At first, we understand, a more complete thing was contemplated, but, the libretto not being ready in time, Mr. Herkomer was driven to rely upon his own resources, and hence the modest dimensions and equally unpretending character of "The Sorceress," described very properly as a "romantic fragment," and lasting a little over an hour in representation. The story of the fragment is, of course, incomplete, suggesting, indeed, an episode taken from the body of a larger work. It may be told in very few words. A band of gipsies are sleeping on the verge of a forest in Germany, but their Queen (the Sorceress) anxiously waits the arrival of an Attendant with a stolen child of noble birth, who shall be to the tribe a talisman of good fortune. The Attendant arrives with the ill-gotten treasure. A Minstrel of the band makes love to the Queen, and sings outside her tent. The gipsies are roused from slumber by their Chief, and, after a good deal of characteristic action and singing, are informed that the child is in camp. They receive the news with joy, and, on the boy's appearance, do him enthusiastic homage. A Hermit passes through the camp, and gives his blessing, from which the heathen folk shrink with distrust. Then the Queen and the boy are lifted on the shoulders of the gipsies, and the triumphant "children of the sun" disappear into the depths of the forest. A young Shepherd is presently seen peering into the deserted encampment, where, growing bolder, he searches about and finds a necklace. To him enter an old Shepherd and a Shepherdess. The youth bestows the necklace on the maiden, sings a song of welcome to the morning, and, embracing his companion, disappears with her into the wood, singing as he goes. On this the curtain falls. The whole action of the piece takes place between the first sign of dawn and the moment when the sun is expected to appear. As may be supposed, therefore, atmospheric effects are a great feature in the stage pictures, and very charmingly indeed are they produced, with surprising truth to nature. The stage pictures, it is needless to add, are beautiful in the extreme, colour, grouping, and all accessories showing the cultivated taste of an artist who has artists to carry out his directions. They are a true feast for the eye, and worth a journey to a much more distant place than Bushey.

With regard to Professor Herkomer's music (scored for orchestra by Mr. Carl Armbruster, who conducts the performances), it may be said at once that no pretensions are made to the extreme elaboration of modern art, with its complicated and often bewildering machinery. Mr. Herkomer is a believer in the expressive power and beauty of true vocal melody, and he has a knack of inventing it to suit the sentiments and situations of the drama. He has, moreover, the good sense to present it without a mass of distracting accompaniments, so that the true and predominant feeling of the airs passes without interference to the audience. With this, however, the orchestra is not neglected. Its turn comes when the voices cease, and pantomimic action has to be illustrated. Here, also, Professor Herkomer is often very happy, sometimes revealing ideas and processes that might be worked out with admirable results. We will not dwell further upon a modest experiment.

Enough has been said to raise expectation of very interesting work next spring, when a complete drama will be essayed. But we cannot conclude without emphatic recognition of the skill with which "The Sorceress" is put upon the stage. It seemed incredible that the whole piece, alike in its inception, development, and representation, is the work of amateurs and even of débütants.

BATH PHILHARMONIC SOCIETY.

(By OUR SPECIAL CORRESPONDENT.)

THERE were notable doings in Bath on the 11th ult., when the Philharmonic Society, of which Mr. Visetti is the musical life and soul, made another day memorable in its history. The Society never fails to celebrate the final Concert of each season with full rites. For that occasion it prepares some work of recent fame, secures the composer as a social "lion" as well as conductor, gathers its friends, and holds whatever in such a case may be equivalent to "high jinks." In 1886, and again in 1887, the hero was Sir Arthur Sullivan, President of the Society, whose "Martyr of Antioch" and "Golden Legend" were respectively performed. Last month the committee's choice fell upon Mr. F. H. Cowen and his latest and greatest work, the dramatic oratorio "Ruth." Both musician and music, we are bound to say, were very well treated in the ancient city that has nestled among the Somersetshire hills for more than a thousand years.

A reception was given to Mr. Cowen in the afternoon of the appointed day, the committee having taken the Assembly Rooms for that purpose, and there gathered, in a place rich with many associations, a large and goodly company, including the Mayor and Mayoress. The proceedings of the reception were quite informal—too much so, indeed, for the purpose intended. In America, the guest to be "met" takes his stand in an appointed place, and the company, or such of them as desire it, are introduced in turn. At Bath, Mr. Cowen was mixed up with a crowd that hardly seemed to know how the time should be spent, and possibly a large proportion of those present never had an opportunity of recognising him. However, the intention was good, and a certain amount of pleasant social intercourse resulted from it.

The performance of "Ruth" took place in the evening at the Theatre Royal, there being no hall in the city sufficiently large to contain a remunerative audience. It is to be feared that the gathering at the theatre did not pay, but the building was less to blame than the popular indifference which left many of its cheaper seats vacant. Stalls, boxes, and "circles" were all occupied by the fashionable and well dressed company that Bath can furnish at the proper season, and looked uncommonly well. But it was a singularly unresponsive audience. Whether the ladies and gentlemen did not understand the music, or were afraid to express an opinion, or affected the languid indifference distinctive of bon ton, we know not, but playing to them must have been cheerless and uphill work. The applause, such as it was, had no heart in it. "Ruth" was preceded by a setting for soli, chorus, and orchestra of Psalm 96, the work of a Bristol organist, Mr. J. H. Anger, who conducted the performance. This music gained a gold medal in a local competition instituted by the Society, and, no doubt, did so on its merits. But Mr. Anger has a good deal to acquire before he can qualify himself for efforts on such an important scale. In particular does he need to discern between ideas that have become common property and others that bear an individual stamp. It is of no use in these days to string together a lot of truisms and platitudes. A musician may have all the learning of Sebastian Bach, but unless he possess distinctive thoughts he had better say nothing. These remarks are not intended to discourage Mr. Anger, but to make him a careful examiner of his own writings and a stern rejector of stale phrases and worn-out devices. When Mr. Cowen succeeded the Bristol musician in the conductor's place he had a polite reception, and everybody then settled down to the real work of the evening. About "Ruth" itself there is now no need to speak, but its performance demands a few remarks, especially as it was made comparatively ineffective through the construction of the orchestra, which occupied the entire stage, rising tier above tier till the male voices at the back were, so to say, projected into the "flies." Much of the sonority of the ensemble was undoubtedly lost owing to the great empty space over the heads of the performers. The solos suffered least, because the principal artists were in advance of the proscenium; but the choruses, even the loudest, reached the audience in an enfeebled condition, and the effect which Mr. Cowen's concerted music in "Ruth" is entitled to make was seriously lacking. This circumstance, however, could not conceal the beauty and propriety of the music, nor abate the interest with which the course of the pretty pastoral story was evidently followed. The committee were enabled to secure the services of four artists who took part in the first performance of the work at Worcester. Miss Anna Williams, who then sang the part of Orpah, now appeared as Ruth, with Miss Hope Glenn as Naomi, Mr. Lloyd as Boaz, and Mr. Watkin Mills as the Reaper and the Elder. These vocalists, in their various degrees, did justice to a familiar task, the honours falling, as of course, to Mr. Lloyd, whose beautiful and fervid singing of "How excellent is Thy loving-kindness" actually roused the lethargic audience to something approaching a demonstration. Mr. Lloyd wisely refused to repeat his effort. Success was also achieved by Miss Williams in "Intreat me not to leave thee," and "My Father, Thou art the guide of my youth," both of those expressive solos being given with entire propriety. The chorus singing could only be judged with hesitation under the conditions above detailed, but we are disposed to doubt whether it came quite up to the "form" shown in the "Martyr of Antioch" two years ago. Mr. Cowen was cordially applauded and recalled at the close of the performance.
